This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

+ Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.

+ Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.

+ Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.

+ Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. THE DECISIONS

OF THE

Supreme Court of the United States,

OCTOBER TERM, 1887.

ANDREW J. COFFEE, Plff. in Err.,
JAMES M. GROOVER ET AL.

Grants of land by government de facto—disputed boundary between Georgia and Florida—history of.

*1. Grants of land made by a government, in territory over which it exercises political jurisdiction de facto, but which does not rightfully belong to it, are invalid as against the government to which the territory rightfully belongs.

2. Where a disputed boundary between two States is adjusted and settled, grants previously made, by either State, of lands claimed by it, and over which it exercised political jurisdiction, but which, on the adjustment of the boundary, are found to be within the territory of the other State, are void unless confirmed by the latter State; and such confirmation cannot affect the titles of the same lands previously granted by the latter State itself.

3. The boundary between Georgia and Florida was long in dispute; Georgia claiming to a line called Watson's line, and exercising political jurisdiction, and making grants of land to that line; whilst Florida claimed to a line called McNeil's line, further north than Watson's. Upon running the true line, as finally agreed upon by the two States, it was found to be further north than McNeil's line: Held (1) that the grant made by Georgia of the land in dispute, which was south of McNeil's line, though made whilst Georgia exercised the powers of government de facto over the territory there, was nevertheless void; (2) that the confirmation by Florida of the grants made by Georgia, did not invalidate or disturb the grant of the land in dispute previously made by itself.

The history of the Florida boundary stated.

Argued and submitted April 20, 1887. Decided October 17, 1887.

Reported below, 20 Fla. 61. See also 19 Fla.

The history and facts of the case appear in the opinion of the court.

Mr. Angus Paterson, for plaintiff in error:

Head notes by Mr. Justice BRADLEY.

The principal question involved in this case is the boundary between the States of Georgia and Florida, and as to the title of lands in the State of Florida. The dividing line between the States of Georgia and Florida was at a very early period recognized as a line running due east from the junction of the Flint and Chattahoochee Rivers to the head of the Saint Mary's River.

Hodgkiss, Stat. Laws Ga. 83; Code of Ga. 1881-7, § 21; Thomp. Dig. Fla. 4, also 584; Const. Fla. 1868, art. 1; Bright. Dig. U. S. Laws, § 2.

The line was not permanently marked until A. D. 1859. This was done by B. F. Whitner on the part of Florida and G. J. Orr, on the part of Georgia, and was called the Whitner & Orr line, being the furthest north of all the lines.

There was also a line marked by McNeil which has been noticed by both States. The State Legislature of Florida ratified all grants made by the State of Georgia that might fall south of the Whitner & Orr line, provided they did not come south of the McNeil line.

Laws Fla. 1859, chap. 1017.

There is a neighborhood line still further south called the Watson line; but it is not found in the statutes of either State, and is only referred to in the Act of Congress passed to quiet titles along the line, which the United States had not conveyed.

U. S. Stat. at L. 1872, p. 52, chap. 451.

There are none of these Acts that give the State of Georgia the right to grant the land in controversy, or to make a valid deed. This land lies not only south of the Whitner & Orr line, but also south of the McNeil line and was a part of the land ceded by Spain, A. D. 1819, and the United States had the right to grant this land to the State of Florida or otherwise. The Whitner & Orr line is now the acknowledged line between the States of Georgia and Florida, so established and fixed by the States themselves.

Laws Fla. 1859, chap. 1017; 1861, Resolution

No. 16; McClelland, Dig. pp. 952, §§ 8,11; Code Ga. 1861, pp. 6, 7, §§ 17, 21.

It is the right of independent Nations to establish and fix disputed boundaries between their respective territories, and this right belongs to the several States of the American Union with one exception, by the consent of Congress, and persons claiming land under grants from the States are subject to the conditions of the compact made by the States.

Poole v. Fleeger, 36 U. S. 11 Pet. 185 (9:680); Rhode Island v. Mass. 37 U. S. 12 Pet. 657 (9: 1233); Garcia v. Lee, Id. 511 (9: 1176).

The land in controversy was patented by the United States to Florida A. D. 1850.

Certificate of Hugh A. Corley, Commissioner of Lands and Immigration.

This certificate is evidence and of the same force that the patent itself would be.

Laws Fla. 1875, chap. 2063.

The land had previously been surveyed and as soon as it came into market was entered by McCall & Stripling.

Certificate of D. Eagan, Comr. of L. and I. Laws Fla. 1875, chap. 2063.

But they received no deed, only a certificate which they afterwards transferred to the plaintiff in appeal who procured a deed to himself from the State, and is therefore entitled to the land, having a perfect chain of titles from the United States Government to himself.

The defendants claim title through the State of Georgia by grants issued in 1842.

The land in controversy belonged to Spain until 1819 when it was purchased by the United States, and Georgia had no more right to convey this land after it became the property of the United States than she had when it belonged to Spain, and even claiming it for a long time does not give title by occupancy. No Statute of Limitations will run against the government.

Ang. Lim. §§ 84, 87; U. S. v. Hoar, 2 Mason, 312.

It was conceded by Floridians that the McNeil line was the boundary between the two States, as that line had been recognized by the the States, although not adopted. But they have never conceded that Georgia had a right to come south of the McNeil line. The Watson line was a private line drawn by some individual which cut off a large piece from Florida. And if Georgia has a right to this strip of land, for the same reason she might have taken all of the State of Florida.

The land in controversy is a part of Florida, proved by the plaintiff in error and admitted by the defendant in error. It has been conveyed by the United States and a patent issued therefor.

The line fixed by the States of Florida and Georgia and ratified by Congress is north of all the lines. This line was ratified by Congress in 1872.

There is no dispute as to where the boundary line is, or as to the location of the land in controversy; it is admitted to be in Florida, and south of the McNeil line; therefore a patent from the United States Government to that land is superior to all others.

This case was determined by the Circuit Court of the United States in 1876.

The suit was brought by A. J. Coffee against Mary J. Groover, executor of Charles E. Groover, and she had full power by the will to represent the estate.

And the state court had no right to try this cause because the United States court had jurisdiction of the whole matter.

Evans v. Percifull, 5 Ark. 428; Elliott v. Peirsol, 26 U. S. 1 Pet. 340 (7: 170); also 27 U. S. 2 Pet. 169 (7: 385).

The first judgment in this cause was for the plaintiff in error, by the Circuit Court of the State of Florida, in and for Jefferson County, and the Supreme Court of Florida committed an error in reversing said judgment.

See Groover v. Coffee, 19 Fla. 64.

It was afterwards tried in the Circuit Court for Jefferson County and the verdict and judgment given for the Groovers, and on appeal taken to the supreme court, this last judgment was affirmed, which plaintiff in error claims to be erroneous.

Coffee v. Groover, 20 Fla. 61.

Messrs. S. Pasco and C. W. Stevens, for defendants in error:

Florida expressly withheld her lands in this disputed territory from the market until the settlement of the boundary line between the two States.

Stat. Fla. chap. 168; Sess. 3, p. 23; chap. 924; Sess. 9, p. 58.

The register had no power under the state law to make the bargain with McCall & Stripling at the time he issued his certificate to them. Later, while attempting to settle the boundary question, and before she parted with her title, she confirmed the Georgia grants to the Watson line in the occupying claimants. This was doubtless intended to be and was an inducement to Georgia to make the final settlement, which was not favorable to her.

Stat. Fla. chap. 1017; adjourned Sess. 9, p. 28.

This court will not entertain jurisdiction, if the judgment of the state court can be sustained by some proposition in the record, of which it has exclusive jurisdiction.

The land in controversy was never in fact a part of the State of Florida until the Orr and Whitner line, which lies north of both the McNeil and Watson lines was agreed upon by the two States as the boundary line, and this agreement became effective by the implied ratification of Congress in 1872.

19 Fla. 81; Acts 42d Cong. Sess. 2, p. 52, chap. XCI.

Georgia settled the questions between her and the General Government as to the public lands within her borders, by the solemn agreement April 24, 1802, by which she ceded to the United States her territory west of the Chattahoochee River, and the government, among other things, agreed to extinguish for the benefit of Georgia the Indian claims to lands within her remaining territory. This was accomplished by different treaties with the Indians. The one which included the land in dispute was made at Fort Jackson, August 9, 1814, by General A. Jackson with the Creeks. The territory then acquired by the legislative action of Georgia became Irwin County in 1818, and from it

Thomas, Brooks and other Counties were set off in later years. At this time Florida was a Spanish Province. Her northern boundary had never been established. Its terminal points only through this section were defined.

1 Laws U. S. 488, 490; 2 Charters and Consts. of U. S. 1049, 1052; Acts 5th Cong. Sess. 2; 6th Cong. Sess. 1; Treaty, 1 Laws of U. S. 700; Lamar's Compilation of Georgia Laws, 416; 1 Charters and Const. pp. 308, 313. 8 Stat. at L. 138.

The survey attached to each grant to James Groover in the record of this case shows that Georgia was in possession of the land here claimed as a part of her County of Irwin, July 2, 1820, and that her surveying party was then laying it off into lots preparatory to its sale. This was prior to the ratification of the Treaty between the United States and Spain, which resulted in the purchase of Florida.

Spain ratified this Treaty October 24, 1820, and the United States, February 19, 1821.

Thomp. Dig. 568.

The testimony and contemporaneous history show that during this period Georgia exercised her jurisdiction and sovereignty over the territory south of the boundary line, as since established, as far as the southern boundary of the land herein disputed, which is the Watson line. Under these circumstances the grants were made by a government de facto, and, we think, de jure, until she relinquishes her right, and as such they are valid, and the rights so acquired are respected and sacred.

U. S. v. Arredondo, 31 U. S. 6 Pet. 712 (8: 555); U. S. v. Clarke, 33 U. S. 8 Pet. 436, 445 (8: 1001, 1004); Delassus v. U. S. 34 U. S. 9 Pet. 133 (9: 77); Smith v. U. S. 35 U. S. 10 Pet. 330 (9: 443); Mayor, Etc. of N. O. v. U. S. Id. 712 (9: 592); Poole v. Fleeger, 36 U. S. 11 Pet. 185, 209 (9: 680, 690); Rhode Island v. Mass. 37 U. S. 12 Pet. 657, 748 (9: 1233, 1270); Johnson v. M'Intosh, 21 U. S. 8 Wheat. 589 (5: 692); Henderson v. Poindexter, 25 U. S. 12 Wheat. 535 (6: 719); De La Croix v. Chamberlain, Id. 600 (6: 742); Rhode Island v. Mass. 45 U. S. 4 How. 591, 639 (11: 1116, 1137) 19 Fla. 61, 80.

Such was the decision of the Supreme Court of Florida. The Congress acted in this spirit in ratifying the agreement between the States by yielding all claim of the government to the lands between the McNeil and Watson lines to the Georgia grantees, and the McNeil line is now omitted from the Georgia maps. And in 1860 Congress arranged for a settlement of all property rights growing out of the unadjusted boundary between the two States whenever the boundary line should be finally surveyed and confirmed.

Acts 42d Cong. Sess. 2, p. 52, chap. XCI; 2 Bright, Dig. 401.

In view of the fact that the Supreme Court of Florida has twice carefully examined and discussed the points as here presented, and has cited many authorities in support of the conclusions reached, it is not deemed necessary to do more than cite some of the authorities bearing upon the case, and ask that this court consider the cases in 19 and 20 Florida, and the citations there, which may not be included in this brief.

Mr. Justice Bradley delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action of ejectment for 97 acres of land in Madison County, Florida, situated near the boundary line between that State and Georgia. The plaintiffs were James M. Groover and others, heirs at law of Charles A. Groover, and now defendants in error; the defendant was Andrew J. Coffee, the present plaintiff in error. Judgment was first rendered by the court of first instance in favor of the defendant below; but being reversed by the Supreme Court of Florida, a new trial was had and judgment was given for the plaintiffs, and affirmed by the supreme court. The last judgment of the supreme court is brought here for review on two grounds: first, that the matter in controversy had been tried and determined by the Circuit Court of the United States for the Northern District of Florida, in favor of the defendant Coffee, in a suit between him and the executrix of Charles A. Groover, the ancestor under whom the plaintiffs claim title; secondly, on the ground that the defendant's title to the land in controversy was claimed by him under a grant made by the United States to the State of Florida, and by the State of Florida to the defendant, which title was set aside by the state court in favor of the plaintiff's title derived under a conflicting grant from the State of Georgia.

The first ground of error is not raised on the record in such a manner as to avail the defendant. The matter of defense involved therein was set up by two pleas: first, a plea of former recovery; and, secondly, a plea to the jurisdiction of the court. These pleas were overruled on demurrer, but for what reason is not stated. The Supreme Court of Florida, however, in its opinion, very properly says: "In ejectment all legal defenses may be made under the plea of not guilty, and the special denials mentioned in the statute. McClelland's Dig. 481. Special pleas of matter affecting the legal title, or in estoppel, only encumber the record and tend to embarrassment. Wade v. Doyle, 17 Fla. 522; Neal v. Spooner, 20 Fla. 38. They should be struck out by the court sua sponte, or on motion, or on demurrer, because they are not proper pleas; but a judgment sustaining a demurrer will not preclude proof, on the trial, of the facts so improperly pleaded." The pleas being overruled, no attempt was made, on the trial, to set up the defense by proof of the former judgment relied on. This branch of the case, therefore, may be laid out of view.

The second ground for reversal is stated in duplicate form in the assignment of errors, as follows, to wit:

1. "In the record and proceedings aforesaid there is manifest error, to wit: That the Supreme Court of the State of Florida in the above stated cause decided that a grant for land issued by the State of Georgia is superior to a patent issued by the United States for the same land, the said land being situate within the territorial limits of the State of Florida."

2. "There is manifest error in this; to wit, that the Supreme Court of the State of Florida in the above stated cause, by the record aforesaid it appears, held that the plaintiff in error should be ousted from certain lands embraced within the territory of the State of Florida, he holding title through the State of Florida derived from the United States, and that the defendants in error should be put in possession, they claiming under a grant issued by the State of Georgia."

By section 709 of the Revised Statutes, where the decision of the state court is against a title claimed under the Constitution, or any treaty or statute of, or a commission held, or authority exercised under, the United States, this court has jurisdiction to review the decision. We think it will sufficiently appear from the facts of the present case, and the points of law arising thereon, that it satisfies the conditions of the section. The title claimed by the defendant rested, not only on a grant of the United States, but on a delimitation of territory under a Treaty between the United States and Spain.

The case is one of conflicting grants of the same land lying near the boundary line between Georgia and Florida. The fact that the land in controversy was covered by both grants was settled by the jury. It is conceded to lie within the bounds of Florida according to the line recently agreed upon by the two States.

The occasion of conflicting grants being made was the uncertain location, at the time, of the true boundary line referred to, and the fact that Georgia claimed one line and the United States and Florida claimed another.

The plaintiffs, to maintain their title to the land in dispute, gave in evidence on the trial two patents from the State of Georgia to one James Groover, each bearing date the 1st day of January, 1842; one for 226$\frac{4}{10}$ acres of land, described as situate in the fifteenth district of Irwin County, Georgia, and known and distinguished in the plan of said district by the number 199, and having the shape, form and marks shown by a plat annexed; the other patent being for 250$\frac{4}{10}$ acres of land, situate in the same district and county, known and distinguished by the number 200, and having the shape, form and marks shown by a plat annexed. The plats showed that the two lots joined each other east and west, and that they were both bounded on the south by a common line called on the plats "Florida line;" and it was testified that the line thus marked on the plats was a line known as the "Watson line." Mesne conveyances were then given in evidence showing that said lots were conveyed by James Groover to Thomas A. Groover by deed dated December 31, 1855; and by Thomas A. Groover to Charles A. Groover by deed dated July 8, 1860; and it was further shown that Charles A. Groover died in 1866, and that the plaintiffs were his heirs at law. Evidence was also given tending to show that the said patentee and grantees respectively had possession of said lands under and in conformity with their said titles until the plaintiffs were ousted by the defendant in 1876.

Evidence was further given to show that another line, called the "McNeil line," ran about 14 chains north of the Watson line and parallel thereto, and that the land in controversy lay between the said two lines, having the Watson line on the south and the McNeil line on the north. Also, that a third line, called the "Orr and Whitner line," ran still farther north than either of the aforesaid lines, which Orr and Whitner line was conceded to be the boundary line between the States of Georgia and Florida, as recently fixed by mutual agreement between the two States, by certain laws and resolutions of their respective Legislatures, confirmed by Act of Congress.

The plaintiffs also introduced evidence tending to show that the Watson line was formerly considered the state line between Georgia and Florida; that Georgians worked the Georgia roads to the Watson line, and Floridians worked the Florida roads to that line; that as far back as one of the witnesses could remember, he being for many years a lawyer and judge in one of the border counties of Georgia, that State had claimed and exercised jurisdiction to the Watson line, until the Orr and Whitner line was agreed upon as the boundary between the two States; that the people living north of the Watson line did jury duty and voted in Georgia; that the wills of people dying there were probated in the Georgia courts, and their estates were administered upon in those courts; that the Georgia courts took jurisdiction of offenses committed as far south as the Watson line, and tried cases in which people living there were interested; that the officers of the Georgia courts executed writs as far south as that line; that persons were tried in Georgia for offenses committed between that line and the Orr and Whitner line. And, on the other hand, as correctly stated by the Supreme Court of Florida in its opinion, there is nothing in the record, nor in the history of the government of the Territory or of the State of Florida, showing that the authorities of the latter exercised any of the powers of government north of the Watson line prior to the said settlement of the boundary between the two States.

The defendant, to maintain the issue on his part, gave in evidence, first, a certified copy of a patent from the United States to the State of Florida, bearing date July 6, 1857, issued under and in pursuance of the Act approved September 28, 1850, known as the Act for granting to certain States the "swamp and overflowed lands" therein; by which patent there was granted to said State, as swamp and overflowed lands, certain designated fractional sections of land, amongst others "the whole of fractional section 29," in township 3 north, range 9 east; which fractional section was proved to be bounded on the north by McNeil's line, and to include the land in controversy. The defendant also produced in evidence a certificate of sale issued by the register of public lands for the State of Florida to one McCall and one Stripling for said fractional section 29, and other land named in said patent, which certificate bore date September 2, 1857, and acknowledged the receipt of $100 in cash, and of certain bonds for the remainder of the purchase money of said lands, as provided by the land laws of Florida. The defendant further gave in evidence a deed from McCall and Stripling to himself, bearing date November 12, 1858, conveying to him all the lands included in said certificate of sale, with a covenant that they were free from incumbrances; also a deed of grant and conveyance of the same lands to the defendant from the Trustees of the Internal Improvement Fund of the State of Florida—the proper authority for that purpose—which last deed bore date September 12, 1874. The defendant, being sworn as a witness, testified that McCall and Stripling paid all the purchase money for the lands to the State; but that the certificate was lost, and he, the defendant, afterwards made proof of it, and had the trustees of the Improvement Fund make him a deed; but that the original receipt had since been found. He also testified that he had lived near the Georgia line for over forty years and never heard of the Watson line until about ten or twelve years ago. He worked the public roads up to the McNeil line, and the Georgians worked their roads down to the McNeil line and no further; that the McNeil line was understood by citizens living near the line in both States to be the boundary line between the two States.

The defendant also gave in evidence the testimony of one Lanier, county surveyor of Madison County, Florida, who testified that he had surveyed the lands in controversy, and gave it as his opinion that the plats of land annexed to the plaintiffs' grants did not cover the said land, not having marks thereon for ponds, swamps and streams which he found on the premises; that the Watson line at the place in controversy runs through a large swamp not shown in said plats; that, until the establishment of the Orr and Whitner line, the McNeil line was always considered as the boundary line between Georgia and Florida; that he had frequently surveyed on the Georgia line, and always surveyed to the McNeil line; that he never heard of the Watson line until the controversy that led to this suit.

The court charged the jury that if they believed from the evidence that the State of Georgia, anterior to the year 1842, considered the land in controversy within her territorial limits, and incorporated within one of her counties, over which the authorities of said State exercised the usual powers of government; and that in 1842 the Governor of Georgia granted the identical lands in controversy to James Groover; and that said James Groover conveyed the same lands to Thomas A. Groover in 1855; and that said Thomas A. Groover conveyed the same lands to Charles A. Groover in 1860; and that said Charles A. Groover was dead, and that the plaintiffs were his heirs—then they must find for the plaintiffs; but that if the evidence failed to induce the jury to believe that the lands sued for were the same as those described in the said grants and conveyances; or that the Georgia grants included the lands to the Watson line, they must find for the defendant.

Under this charge the jury found for the plaintiffs, thus establishing the fact that Georgia, anterior to 1842, did claim jurisdiction to the Watson line, and that the lands in controversy adjoining that line were included in the grant of Georgia to James Groover in 1842.

The Supreme Court of Florida sustained the charge of the court below, it being in accordance with its own opinion given when the case was first before it, as reported in 19 Fla. 64. The position assumed is that grants in a disputed territory, by a government exercising therein sovereign jurisdiction de facto, are valid and to be sustained, notwithstanding that, by a subsequent settlement of boundaries, the disputed territory is conceded to the other contesting sovereign. Georgia, undoubtedly, at the time of the grant to James Groover, exercised the powers of government de facto over the territory in which the land in controversy was situated; and it is assumed by the Supreme Court of Florida that the boundary line subsequently agreed upon, by which said land was conceded to lie in the State of Florida, was a mere arbitrary line, adopted by way of compromise, and was never acknowledged to be the true legal line established by previous treaties and laws. The argument is, that, whatever may be the law with regard to grants made by a government clearly beyond its lawful boundaries and jurisdiction, it is certain that grants made within its jurisdiction, being lawful when made, are not invalidated by a subsequent cession of the territory to another sovereign; because, in such case, the rights of sovereignty only, and not those of private property, are changed. It is then assumed that, in cases of disputed boundary, where a line is finally fixed by compromise, the portions of territory previously possessed by either of the contracting parties, and conceded by the adopted line to the other, are to be regarded and treated as ceded territory, and not as territory that always really belonged to the sovereign who gets it by the compromise. The Supreme Court of Florida, speaking of the decision of the lower court, which it affirmed, says: "What they did decide was, that grants by a government de facto of parts of a disputed territory in its possession are valid against the State which had the right; De La Croix v. Chamberlain, 24 U. S. 12 Wheat. 600 [6:742]; and that, when a territory is acquired by treaty, cession, or conquest, the rights of the inhabitants to property are respected and sacred. Rhode Island v. Mass. 37 U. S. 12 Pet. 657, 749 [9:1233, 1270]; 45 U. S. 4 How. 591, 639 [11:1116, 1187]; U. S. v. Clarke, 33 U. S. 8 Pet. 436, 445 [8:1001, 1004]. And the principle applies to the States of this Union. Poole v. Fleeger, 36 U. S. 11 Pet. 185, 209 [9: 680, 690]. In the latter case, the court says, p. 210 [690]: 'Although, in the compact, Walker's line is agreed to be in future the boundary between the two States, it is not so established as having been for the past the true and rightful boundary.' We decided this to be the rule in the present case when it was before us on the former appeal (19 Fla. supra), and the cause was tried the second time under the influence of the opinion and judgment of this court. We find no reason for modifying that judgment, and the error assigned is not sustained. Coffee v. Groover, 20 Fla. 64, 81.

Whether the view of the case thus taken by the Supreme Court of Florida is the correct one, regard being had not only to the facts found by the jury, but also to the Treaties and Acts of the Federal Government, as well as of Georgia, in regard to the line in question; and whether the rule of law relied on by the court is a sound one, and rightly applicable to the case in hand, are the questions to be determined.

It is no doubt the received doctrine, that in cases of ceded or conquered territory, the rights of private property in lands are respected. Grants made by the former government, being rightful when made, are not usually disturbed. Allegiance is transferred from one government to the other without any subversion of property. This doctrine has been laid down very broadly on several occasions by this court,—particularly in cases arising upon grants of land made by the Spanish and other goverments in Louisiana and Florida before those countries were ceded to the United States. It is true that the property rights of the people, in those cases, were protected by stipulations in the treaties of cession, as is usual in such treaties; but the court took broader ground, and held, as a general principle of international law, that a mere cession of territory only operates upon the sovereignty and jurisdiction, including the right to the public domain, and not upon the private property of individuals which had been segregated from the public domain before the cession. This principle is asserted in the cases of U. S. v. Arredondo, 31 U. S. 6 Pet. 691 [8: 547]; U. S. v. Percheman, 32 U. S. 7 Pet. 51, 86-89 [8: 604, 618]; Delassus v. U. S. 34 U. S. 9 Pet. 117 [9: 71]; Strother v. Lucas, 37 U. S. 12 Pet. 428 [9: 1114]; Doe v. Eslava, 50 U. S. 9 How. 443 [13: 209]; Jones v. McMasters, 61 U. S. 20 How. 17 [15: 809]; and Leitensdorfer v. Webb, Id. 176 [15: 891]. In U. S. v. Percheman, Chief Justice Marshall said: "It may not be unworthy of remark, that it is very unusual, even in cases of conquest, for the conqueror to do more than to displace the sovereign and assume dominion over the country. The modern usage of Nations, which has become law, would be violated; that sense of justice and of right which is acknowledged and felt by the whole civilized world would be outraged, if private roperty should be generally confiscated, and private rights annulled. The people change their allegiance; their relation to their ancient sovereign is dissolved; but their relations to each other, and their rights of property, remain undisturbed. If this be the modern rule even in cases of conquest, who can doubt its application to the case of an amicable cession of territory? Had Florida changed its sovereign by an Act containing no stipulation respecting the property of individuals, the right of property in all those who became subjects or citizens of the new government would have been unaffected by the change." 7 Pet. 86, 87 [8: 617].

But whilst this is the acknowledged rule in cases of ceded, and even conquered territory, with regard to titles acquired from a former sovereign who had undoubted right to create them, it does not apply (as we shall see) to cases of disputed boundary, in relation to titles created by a sovereign in possession, but not rightfully so. In the latter case, when the true boundary is ascertained, or adjusted by agreement, grants made by either sovereign beyond the limits of his rightful territory, whether he had possession, or not (unless confirmed by proper stipulations), fail for want of title in the grantor. This is the general rule. Circumstances may possibly exist which would make valid the grants of a government de facto; as, for example, where they contravene no other rights. Grants of public domain made by Napoleon as sovereign de facto of France, may have had a more solid basis of legality than similar grants made by him as sovereign de facto of a Prussian Province, derogatory to the rights of the Government and King of Prussia.

As the case before us depends upon a disputed boundary between two States, it cannot be properly understood or determined without adverting to the historical facts connected with that boundary. Some of these are referred to by the Supreme Court of Florida in its opinion, but several others are necessary to be stated in order to show the circumstances under which the boundary between Georgia and Florida was finally settled, and to determine whether the assumption of the court, that the territory containing the land in controversy was ceded by Georgia to Florida, is well founded. The case, if it can be avoided, ought not to be decided upon a narrow selection of facts which might determine the question one way, before one jury, to-day, and another way, before another jury, to-morrow; but upon a broad view of all the historical events which relate to this boundary line. We shall proceed, therefore, to review these events as far as they have come to our knowledge from public documents.

In early colonial times, there were always mutual complaints of encroachment between the British Provinces and the Spanish Province of Florida, sometimes resulting in military conflicts; and no boundary was ever settled between them. The difficulty was finally removed by the Treaty of 1763, by which Florida was ceded to Great Britain. See Treaty, arts. VII, XX, 1 Chalmers, 473, 479. Soon after this event, on the 7th of October, 1763, King Geo. III, by proclamation, erected governments in the newly acquired Territories of Canada and the Floridas, and established the boundaries of the latter as follows, to wit: "The government of East Florida, bounded to the westward by the Gulf of Mexico and the Apalachicola River: to the northward by a line drawn from that part of said river where the Chattahoochee and Flint Rivers meet to the source of the St. Mary's River, and by the course of the said river to the Atlantic Ocean." West Florida was bounded north by the parallel of 31° north latitude, from the Mississippi to the Chattahoochee River. See Proclamation in Amer. State Papers; 1 Pub. Lands, 36; and 1 Bioren's Laws, U. S. 443. On January 20, 1764, the Province of Georgia was limited to the north of the line thus prescribed for Florida. 1 Bioren's Laws, 448-9.

The above defined line, from the junction of the Chattahoochee and Flint Rivers to the source of the St. Mary's has from 1763 to the present time been the recognized boundary line between Georgia and Florida. The land in controversy is situated about midway between its extremities.

By the definitive Treaty of peace with Great Britain in 1783 the line above described was adopted as the southern boundary line of the United States, and the Floridas were at the same time, by another Treaty, ceded to Spain. See Treaties and Conventions, 315; 2 Chalmers, 232, Treaties of 1783. By the Treaty of October 27, 1795, between the United States and Spain, this boundary was confirmed, and it was provided that a commissioner and a surveyor should be appointed by each party to meet at Natchez within six months from the ratification of the Treaty, and proceed to run and mark the boundary line, and make plats and keep journals of their proceedings, which should be considered as part of the Treaty. Our government appointed Andrew Ellicott, Esq., as commissioner, in May, 1796, and a surveyor, to assist him, and they proceeded to Natchez, and after much procrastination on the part of the Spanish authorities, a Captain Stephen Minor was appointed on the part of Spain, and the joint commissioners of the two countries, in 1796 and 1799, ran and marked the boundary line from the Mississippi to the Chattahoochee, and determined the geographical position of the junction of the Chattahoochee and Flint Rivers to be in N. latitude 30° 42′ 8″ and W. longitude 84° 53′ 15″. The hostility of the Creek Indians prevented them from running the line east of the Chattahoochee; but they sailed around the coast of Florida, and up the River St. Mary's, and fixed upon the eastern terminus of the straight line prescribed in the Treaties, at the head of the St. Mary's, where it issues from the Okefenoke Swamp, and erected a mound of earth to designate the spot. This was in February, 1800. The mound is still in existence, and is called Ellicott's Mound, and appears on all the principal maps of that part of the country. The commissioners, supposing that the true head of the river was located in the swamp, agreed that it should be considered as distant two miles northeast from the mound, and that in running the boundary line from the Chattahoochee it should be run to the north of the mound, and not nearer to it than one mile. The point fixed upon as the head of the St. Mary's was determined by observations to be in N. latitude 30° 21′ 39½″, W. longitude 82° 15′ 45″. The distance by straight line, or great circle, from the junction of the Chattahoochee and Flint Rivers to the head of the St. Mary's, was calculated at 155$\frac{4}{10}$ miles, and the initial course for running the line from each terminus, was given, with the proper corrections to be made at intervals in order to follow the great circle. The commissioners signed a joint report of their proceedings, and transmitted the same to their respective governments. All these particulars are set forth in Mr. Ellicott's journal, and are matters of public history. See Ellicott's Journal; Phila. 1803.

It thus appears that, by authority of the United States and Spain, the termini of the line in question were fixed and settled in February, 1800. It only remained for any competent surveyor to follow the directions of the commissioners in order to trace the actual boundary line on the ground.

The country in the region traversed by this line was occupied, in the early part of the century, by the nation of Creek Indians, and there was no immediate demand for having it run and marked. And as, under the Constitution, no State could enter into a treaty with the Indians, it became the interest of Georgia to make some arrangement with the Government of the United States to take measures for the gradual removal of Indian occupancy. A convention was accordingly entered into between Georgia and the United States, on the 24th of April, 1802, by which the former ceded to the latter all her territory between the Chattahoochee and the Mississippi Rivers, and the United States ceded to Georgia all their right to any public lands south of Tennessee and the Carolinas, and east of the Chattahoochee, not within the proper boundaries of any State; and agreed to extinguish the Indian title within the State of Georgia as early as could be peaceably done. See Agreement, 1 Bioren's L. 488. In pursuance of this agreement the title of the Creek Nation was extinguished throughout most of the southern part of the State by the Treaties made with the Nation in 1802, 1805 and 1814. 7 Stat. at L. 68, 96, 120.

The State being now desirous of disposing of her lands and introducing settlers thereon, naturally turned her attention to the question of the true location of the boundary line between her own territory and that of the Spanish Province of Florida. Some person, professing to be better posted than others as to the topography of the country about the head of St. Mary's River, asserted that the commissioners, Ellicott and Minor, in seeking its source, had ascended the wrong branch, namely, the north branch; whereas the true St. Mary's, or main stream, came from the west and took its source many miles further south than the point fixed upon by them. The Legislature of Georgia took up the matter, and in December, 1818, the Senate passed a resolution requesting the Governor to appoint proper persons to proceed, without delay, to ascertain the true head of St. Mary's River; and if it should appear that the mound thrown up by Ellicott and Minor was not at the place set forth in the Treaty with Spain, that they make a special report of the facts, and that the Governor communicate the same to the President of the United States, with a request that the lines might be run agreeably to the true intent and meaning of the Treaty. Exec. Doc. No. 77, Sess. 1, 23d Cong. pp. 11, 86.

In pursuance of this request the Governor appointed three eminent engineers, Generals Floyd, Thompson and Blackspear, to make the examination suggested, and immediately, by a letter dated February 17, 1819, communicated the fact to the Executive Government at Washington. The engineers made a careful reconnoissance of the country about the head streams of the St. Mary's, accompanied by the person who had made the supposed discovery, and became satisfied that his information was at fault, and reported that, after a careful examination, they found the head of the river to agree with the report made by Mr. Ellicott. This result was also communicated to the Executive at Washington; and thus ended, for the time being, the claim on the part of Georgia to have the eastern terminus of the boundary line readjusted and changed. Soon after this proceeding, in 1819, the State employed one J. C. Watson to run and mark the line. This is the origin of the line called Watson's line; and to this line the State laid out its counties and townships, surveyed its public lands, and made grants to settlers. But it nowhere appears that this line ran to Ellicott's mound, or near to it; on the contrary, it would seem from other conceded facts, that it ran considerably south of it. As we have already seen, the lands in controversy in the present case adjoin this line, being situated on the north side of it.

Florida was ceded to the United States in 1819, and possession of the territory was taken by Gen. Jackson in July, 1821. In 1825, the Surveyor-General of the Government for the Territory of Florida, preparatory to a survey of the public lands therein, caused the boundary line between Georgia and Florida to be run out and marked by D. F. McNeil, a deputy surveyor, and the line so run was called McNeil's line. At the point in controversy, which (as before said) is about midway between the two extremities of the straight line called for by the Treaty, it ran, according to the testimony, 14 chains to the north of Watson's line; but how near it approached Ellicott's mound at the eastern extremity does not appear. The government surveys in Florida were made to bound on this line; and, of course, overlapped, more or less, the Georgia surveys and grants extending to Watson's line.

The State of Georgia, about this period, perhaps in consequence of the location of McNeil's line, by a communication of her Governor to the Government of the United States, requested that joint measures should be undertaken for a mutual and final settlement of the boundary. The matter being referred to Congress, an Act was passed on the 4th of May, 1826, by which the President was authorized, in conjunction with the constituted authorities of the State of Georgia, to cause to be run and distinctly marked the line dividing the Territory of Florida from the State of Georgia, from the junction of the Rivers Chattahoochee and Flint, to the head of St. Mary's River; and for that purpose, to appoint a commissioner or surveyor, or both; "Provided, that the line so to be run and marked shall be run straight from the junction of said Rivers Chattahoochee and Flint, to the point designated as the head of St. Mary's River by the commissioners appointed under the third article of the Treaty (with Spain), made October 27, 1795." 4 Stat. at L. 157. This Act, it will be seen, adopted the eastern terminus of the line as settled by Ellicott and Minor.

The President thereupon appointed ex-Governor Thomas M. Randolph, of Virginia, as commissioner under the Act, and the Executive of Georgia appointed Thomas Spalding; and the commissioners entered upon their joint duties in February, 1827, and appointed John McBride as their common surveyor. They continued their operations for over two months, but the Georgia commissioner having, as he supposed, notwithstanding the report of the commissioners of 1819, discovered that the western branch of the St. Mary's River was the largest and longest stream, and, therefore, the true river, the Governor of the State suddenly brought the survey to a close by recalling the assent of Georgia and withdrawing the powers of her commissioner. Exec. Doc. 77, Sess. 1, 23d Cong. pp. 31, 97.

From this time onward, for many years, a controversy was carried on between Georgia, on the one side, and the United States and Florida, on the other, with regard to this boundary line; Georgia contending that the line should be run to Lake Randolph, the head of the western or southern branch of the St. Mary's, and the United States and Florida contending that it should run to the head of the northern branch, as settled and determined by the commissioners, Ellicott and Minor, under the Treaty. Id. and Exec. Doc. 152, Sess. 1, 23d Cong.

In 1845, Florida was admitted into the Union as a State, embracing all the territories of East and West Florida, as ceded by Spain to the United States by the Treaty of 1819. 5 Stat. at L. 743. Renewed efforts were soon afterwards made by Florida and Georgia to effect a settlement of the boundary, but without success.

In 1850 the State of Florida filed a bill in this court against the State of Georgia, to procure a determination of the controversy. In December Term, 1854, the Attorney-General was allowed to intervene on the part of the United States. Florida v. Georgia, 58 U. S. 17 How. 478 [15:181]. Evidence was taken by the parties, but in consequence of the war, and the final settlement of the controversy by mutual agreement, the cause was never brought to a hearing.

In 1857 the Governors of the two States had a conference which resulted in an agreement by which Georgia relinquished her pretensions to have the eastern terminus of the line changed, and the termini fixed by the commissioners, Ellicott and Minor, were substantially adopted. The following resolutions and enactments of the Legislatures of the two States will show the course of the negotiation, and the terms of the arrangement finally concluded between them.

On the 24th of December, 1857, the following resolution was adopted by the Legislature of Georgia, to wit:

"Whereas, in the matter of controversy now pending in the Supreme Court of the United States, between the State of Florida and the State of Georgia, touching the boundary line of the two States, we deem it of much importance that this protracted and expensive litigation should cease; and whereas, with a view to the settlement of the question, a negotiation has been progressing between the late Executives of the aforesaid States, the result of which was an agreement to adopt the terminal points of the present recognized line as the true terminal points of the boundary line, to be resurveyed, corrected and marked, provided it is shown by either party that the present line is incorrect, the agreement aforesaid being made subject to the ratification of the Legislatures of the two States:

"Resolved 1, That we do hereby ratify the action of the late Executive of this State, in accepting the proposition of the Governor of Florida, to adopt the terminal points of the present recognized line as the true terminal points of the boundary line, and will regard, adopt and act upon the present line, as run and recognized between those points, as the settled boundary of the two States, or will so recognize and adopt any other line between those points which may be ascertained and established on a resurvey and remarking of the boundary, provided said boundary correction is made by virtue of law, and by joint action of the States aforesaid.

"2. Be it further resolved by the authority aforesaid, That should it be deemed essential or important by either State to have the boundary line between the terminal points of the present recognized boundary resurveyed and remarked, the Governor of this State is hereby authorized to appoint a competent surveyor, to join any such surveyor appointed on the part of Florida, to run out and mark distinctly such a line from one to the other terminal point herein indicated, to be known as the line and settled boundary between the two States, the surveyor on the part of Georgia to be paid such compensation as may be determined on by the present or any future Legislature.

"3. And be it further resolved, That the Governor of this State shall, so soon as the same shall have passed both branches of the present General Assembly, transmit a certified copy to the Governor of Florida.

"Approved December 24, 1857."

This Resolution was responded to by the Legislature of Florida on the 12th of January, 1859, by passing a resolution in precisely the same terms, mutatis mutandis; and on the 15th of the same month an Act was passed by the Legislature of Florida for bringing into market, as soon as the line should be settled, all state lands bordering thereon, that had not been disposed of, giving to the occupants, whose right was not disputed, five months to purchase the lands occupied by them at their appraised valuation.

As one, or both, of the parties desired to have a resurvey made between the terminal points, the State of Georgia appointed George F. Orr, and the State of Florida B. F. Whitner, surveyors, to run and mark the line accordingly. They commenced their work in 1859, and it is referred to in the subsequent Acts and Resolutions.

An Act was passed by the Legislature of Georgia on the 16th of December, 1859, referring to the fact that the joint surveyors were running their first trial line, and agreeing to adopt it as conclusive, if Florida would do the same; provided that, on the eastern terminus, it did not depart exceeding one fourth of a mile from Ellicott's mound; but that if it was not accepted by Florida, and if, therefore, a new line would have to be run so as to get a straight line from the mouth of Flint River to Ellicott's mound, that then, the line thus designated and marked by the surveyors should be the permanent boundary between the two States. The Act also proposed the passage of laws to quiet the titles of bona fide holders of lands under grants of either Georgia or the United States. The response made by the Legislature or Florida to this proposition was the passage of an Act on the 22d of December, 1859, substantially adopting the proposition made by Georgia declaring "That the line now being run by B. F. Whitner, Jr., on the part of Florida, and G. J. Orr, on the part of Georgia, be and the same is hereby recognized and declared to be the permanent boundary line between the two States, so soon as the same shall be permanently marked by said surveyors: Provided, that said line, at its eastern terminus, does not depart from, or miss, Ellicott's mound more than one fourth of a mile or 20 chains; and declaring, secondly, "that the titles of bona fide holders of land under any grant from the State of Georgia, which land may fall within this State by the foregoing line, are hereby confirmed and conveyed to said holders, so far as any right may accrue to this State: Provided, nothing herein shall apply to lands to which citizens of this State may claim title south of what is known as the McNeil line."

It turned out that the line run by Orr and Whitner ran even farther north than the McNeil line; but it came within the stipulated distance from Ellicott's mound; namely, within a quarter of a mile—in fact, within 37 links, or less than 25 feet,—north of the mound. See Code of Georgia, 1868, § 19. This was more favorable to Georgia than the line agreed on by Ellicott and Minor, which was to run at least one mile north of the mound.

On the 14th of December, 1860, the Legislature of Georgia, probably considering that its last proposition was not fully accepted, passed a resolution, directing the Governor to reopen negotiations with the authorities of Florida in regard to the boundary line, and to urge its adjustment so as to protect the rights of citizenship and the titles of lands held under grants from Georgia; and, if practicable, so as to retain and keep the fractional lots sold by Georgia within the jurisdiction of the State. In response to this Resolution, the Legislature of Florida, on the 8th of February, 1861, passed the following Resolution, to wit: "Whereas, [by] an Act approved by the Governor 22d December, 1859, it was by the General Assembly enacted that the line then being run by B. F. Whitner, Jr., on the part of Florida, [and] G. J. Orr, on the part of Georgia, should be, and was thereby, recognized and declared to be the permanent boundary line between the States of Georgia and Florida as soon as the same should be permanently marked by said surveyors: Provided, the said line at its eastern terminus did not depart from or miss Ellicott's mound more than one fourth of a mile, or 20 chains; and whereas, the said line has been run and marked by said surveyors on the part of the two States, the eastern terminus of which, so run and marked, is within the distance prescribed in said proviso: Therefore, Resolved, That the line run and marked by B. F. Whitner, Jr., on the part of Florida; and G. J. Orr, on the part of Georgia, be, and the same is hereby declared to be, the permanent boundary line between the two States of Georgia and Florida, and that the Governor be, and he is hereby, requested to issue his proclamation that the said line, so run and marked, has been and is declared to be the permanent boundary line between the two States: Provided, the State of Georgia shall have on its part declared the said line to be the boundary between that State and Florida. Be it further resolved, That the Governor be requested to forward a copy of these resolutions to the Governor of Georgia, with a request that similar steps be taken by Georgia, so that the question of boundary may be finally settled." Bush's Digest, 103; McClelland's do. 952.

By a long and argumentative Resolution, passed by the Legislature of Georgia on the 11th of December, 1861, after stating the respective positions taken by the two States, it was proposed as follows: "The General Assembly, to avoid further dispute, proposes to her sister State, Florida, that what is denominated the Watson line (which will leave in the limits of this State the fractional lots of land heretofore sold under an Act of her Legislature) shall be adopted as the boundary line. The settlement upon this basis will not interfere with the rights of citizenship, as claimed by the citizens of either State." Florida made no answer to this proposition.

Finally, by a Resolution passed on the 18th of December, 1866, the Legislature of Georgia, referring to the Act of 16th December, 1859, and recognizing the fact that the Orr and Whitner line, as run, did not depart exceeding one fourth of a mile from Ellicott's mound, and referring also to the action of the Florida Legislature of February 8, 1861, adopted the Orr and Whitner line as "the permanent boundary line between the States of Georgia and Florida." And this agreement, thus finally arrived at by the two States, was recognized and confirmed by an Act of Congress approved April 9, 1872, entitled "An Act to Settle and Quiet the Title to Lands Along the Line Between the States of Georgia and Florida," by which it was declared "that the titles to all lands lying south of the line dividing the States of Georgia and Florida, known as the Orr and Whitner line, lately established as the true boundary between said States, and north of the line run by Georgia, known as the Watson line, being all the lands lying between said lines, be, and the same are hereby, confirmed, so far as the United States has title thereto, in the present owners deriving titles from the State of Georgia."

This historical review is sufficient, it seems to us, to show that the agreement come to by the two States was not in fact, and cannot be construed as, a cession of territory on the part of Georgia. It was simply the correction of the boundary line. Georgia had inadvertently extended her jurisdiction to a line run by her surveyor too far south. The agreement recited in the Resolution of December 24, 1857, "to adopt the terminal points of the present recognized line as the true terminal points of the boundary line," carried out by a resurvey of such line from one of its terminal points to a point sufficiently near the other to satisfy both parties, must be construed to be the carrying out of an intent to settle and establish the true line between the two States, and not an intent to adopt a line different from the true one, with a cession of the territory cut off by it. Two lines had been contended for. Florida and the United States contended for the line established by the joint commission under the Treaty with Spain; Georgia, for a different line, having a widely different terminus at its eastern extremity. Each claimed that its line was the true one. Georgia finally yielded the point, and accepted the commissioners' line. This was tantamount to an acknowledgment that it was the true line. We do not say that the result would have been different if the parties had adopted a compromise line—as, for example, the Watson line, which was proposed by Georgia. When a boundary is in dispute the adoption of a line by compromise may be considered as an agreement that the adopted line is the true line, or that it shall be considered as the true line. Where territories are coterminous, they must have a common boundary. That boundary, whether ascertained by astronomical observations, or discovery of old monuments, or mutual agreement of the parties, is to be regarded and treated as if it had always been known as the true line. The present case, at all events, can only be regarded as one in which the boundary line finally agreed to was always the true line, even though, and even when, a different line (Watson's) was temporarily adopted by Georgia, and acquiesced in by Florida.

Then what becomes of the titles granted by Georgia outside of that line, or south of it? She had no title there herself. Could she confer title by the mere exercise de facto of jurisdiction and government there—such exercise being in derogation of the successive rights of Spain, the United States, and Florida? What authority can be found to justify such a pretension? It is the common usage, it is true, in mutual adjustments of disputed boundaries, to stipulate that private titles shall not be disturbed. Such stipulations are dictated by a humane consideration for those who have innocently invested their fortunes on the faith of the good title of their government. In the present case, as we have seen, the titles granted by Georgia were confirmed both by Florida and by the United States, so far as either had any right or title to be affected. But those confirmations cannot avail the plaintiffs in the present case; for the United States had parted with all their interest in the lands in controversy, by a grant to Florida in July, 1857; and Florida had disposed of all her interest therein by a regular sale in September of the same year. Neither the United States nor Florida, therefore, had any interest remaining, when the confirmatory Acts were passed, which they could transfer by release or confirmation, or in any other mode.

The case, then, stands upon the original validity of the Georgia grants; and the question may well be asked, how does a landholder who obtains title from a sovereign that has none, stand in any better position than one who obtains title from an individual that has none? Georgia had no title to the land. Previous and subsequent historical events abundantly show this. Her grants have nothing to rest on but her actual possession of the disputed territory and her exercise of government de facto therein. The question is, whether this is sufficient.

The general subject is not a new one in the jurisprudence of this court. Before the Treaty of amity, and limits made with Spain in 1795, that government had claimed and occupied, as a part of West Florida, a large extent of country on the east side of the Mississippi, to the north of north latitude 31°—including a a large portion of the present State of Mississippi. This claim was based on an extension of the Province of West Florida to the northward by the Government of Great Britain prior to the Revolutionary War.* It was abandoned by the Treaty referred to, and the parallel of 31° was adopted as the boundary line between the territories of the United States and those of Spain. But prior to that Treaty the Spanish authorities had made grants of land in the territory referred to. This court invariably held those grants, not confirmed by our government, to be invalid, on the ground that the territory did not belong to Spain, though she occupied it and claimed to own it. This point is decided in Henderson v. Poindexter, 25 U. S. 12 Wheat. 530 [6:718]; followed by Hickey v. Stewart, 44 U. S. 3 How. 750 [11:814]; Robinson v. Minor, 51 U. S. 10 How. 627 [13:568]; and other cases. In Henderson v. Poindexter's Lessee, Chief Justice Marshall carefully examined the question of the right of Spain to the territory, and showed that it was untenable, and strenuously argued that the Treaty of 1795 was an acknowledgment on the part of Spain that she had no such right;—or, why did she give it up? The idea of a grant deriving any validity from national occupancy, and government de facto over the territory, was not even hinted at, although Mr. Webster and Mr. Coxe argued the cause for the party claiming under the Spanish grant. The view taken by this court on the subject was accurately expressed by Mr. Justice McLean, in delivering the opinion in Robinson v. Minor, 51 U. S. 10 How. 648 [13:574], where he says: "The Treaty with Spain established [i. e. settled] a disputed boundary; there was no cession of territory. The jurisdiction exercised by Spain over the country north of the 31st degree of north latitude was not claimed or occupied by force of arms against an adversary power; but it was a naked possession, under a misapprehension of right. In such a case, Georgia, within whose sovereignty the country was situated, was not bound to recognize the grants or other evidence of title by the Spanish Government."

The same view was taken by the court with regard to the grants made by Spain in the disputed territory of West Florida after the cession of Louisiana to the United States in 1803. Spain had held possession of Louisiana and the Floridas; but, by the secret Treaty of St. Ildefonso, made in 1800, had ceded Louisiana to France, "with the same extent that it now has in the hands of Spain, and that it had when France possessed it;" and, in 1803, France ceded it to the United States in the same terms. But as formerly possessed by France, Louisiana included West Florida as far as to the River Perdido, and our government claimed to the same extent. Spain, with a good deal of plausibility, contended that West Florida, extending from the Mississippi to the Perdido, was held as a distinct province by Great Britain prior to 1783, and was not embraced in the cession, and refused to surrender it, and kept possession of it in the exercise of full sovereignty until 1810, when the United States took forcible possession of it. Here was another case of disputed boundary. The United States claimed the River Perdido; Spain, the Rivers Mississippi and Iberville, as the true boundary between Louisiana and the Floridas; and the latter was in possession of the disputed territory, exercising all the powers of government therein from 1803 to 1810. During this period the Spanish governors made many grants of land in the territory, which often came before this court for adjudication; and the decision was invariably against their validity.

The first case in which the question arose was that of Foster v. Neilson, 27 U. S. 2 Pet. 253 [7:415], in which the grant was made in 1804, for land in the District of Feliciana, east of the Mississippi. The principal questions argued were, first, the true interpretation of the Treaties of 1800 and 1803, as to what territory was ceded to the United States; and, secondly, the effect of the confirmation of Spanish grants contained in the Treaty of 1819. Mr. Coxe, it is true, took the ground that the acts of a sovereign power over territory it has ceded are lawful until possession has been transferred, and, therefore, that the grants of Spain whilst still in possession and exercising the powers of government de facto should be held to be valid. Mr. Webster, who was on the same side with Mr. Coxe, did not allude to this argument, and the court took no notice of it, but placed its decision on the ground that, by the true construction of the Treaties, Louisiana included West Florida to the Perdido, and, therefore, that the territory in question did not belong to Spain when the grant was made, and so the grant was invalid; but that if this were not a clear proposition (and the court admitted that it was a question of doubtful construction) the judiciary would nevertheless follow the action of the political department of the government, charged with the management of its foreign affairs, which had always contended for the line of the Perdido, and had finally taken full possession of the country.

The case of Foster v. Neilson was followed in the subsequent cases of Garcia v. Lee, 37 U. S. 12 Pet. 511 [9:1176]; U. S. v. Reynes, 50 U. S. 9 How. 127 [13:74]; U. S. v. D'Auterive, 51 U. S. 10 How. 609 [13:560]; U. S. v. Phila. & N. Orleans, 52 U. S. 11 How. 609 [13:834]; Montault v. U. S. 53 U. S. 12 How. 47 [13:887]; U. S. v. Castant, Id. 437 [13:1056]; all of which are referred to, and the history of the controversy is given, in U. S. v. Lynde, 78 U. S. 11 Wall. 632 [20:280].

It may, however, be said that the decision in these cases was controlled by the Act of Congress approved March 26, 1804, 2 Stat. at L. 287, the fourteenth section of which declared void all grants for lands within the territories ceded by the French Republic to the United States by the Treaty of 30th April, 1803, the title whereof was, at the date of the Treaty of St. Ildefonso, in the crown, government or nation of Spain; saving, however, the titles of actual settlers, acquired before December 20, 1803.

It is doubtless true that this Act did have a controlling influence in the cases referred to; but the court discussed the question upon general principles also, and no hint is dropped that the existence of a goverment de facto would have any influence on the decision.

In Garcia v. Lee, Chief Justice Taney expressly argues that, in a case of disputed boundary, titles must stand or fall with the right of the government creating them. His language is: "Indeed, when it is once admitted that the boundary line, according to the American construction of the Treaty, is to be treated as the true one in the courts of the United States, it would seem to follow, as a necessary consequence, that the grant now before the court, which was made by the Spanish authorities within the limit of the territory which then belonged to the United States, must be null and void; unless it has been confirmed by the United States by treaty or otherwise. It is obvious that one Nation cannot grant away the territory of another; and if a proposition so evident needed confirmation, it will be found in the case of Poole v. Fleeger [supra]. In that case there had been a disputed boundary between two States, and the parties claimed the same land under grants from different States. The boundary line had been ascertained by compact between the States after the grants were made. And in deciding between the claimants in that case the court said: 'In this view of the matter it is perfectly clear that the grants made by North Carolina and Tennessee, under which the defendant claimed, were not rightfully made, because they were originally beyond her territorial boundary; and that the grant under which the claimants claim was rightfully made, because it was within the territorial boundary of Virginia.' And again, 'If the States of North Carolina and Tennessee could not rightfully grant the land in question, and the States of Virginia and Kentucky could, the invalidity of the grants of the former arises, not from any violation of the obligation of the grant, but from an intrinsic defect of title in the States.'"

The case of Poole v. Fleeger, quoted by Chief Justice Taney, is much to the purpose. The northern boundary of North Carolina (including Tennessee) was fixed by the charter of 1665, and by the Constitutions of that State and Virginia, adopted in 1776, on the parallel of 36° 30′ north latitude. In 1779 an attempted survey of the line was made by commissioners of the two States, who failed to agree; but a line run by Dr. Walker, one of the commissioners, was practically used as the boundary of jurisdiction. It was afterwards found to be too far north by several miles, and a line was run on the true parallel by Professor Matthews, of Transylvania University. Tennessee laid out her counties and exercised all sovereign jurisdiction up to the Walker line, and both North Carolina and Tennessee made grants of land up to that line and north of the true parallel. On the other hand, Kentucky made grants south of that line and up to Matthews' line. In 1820, Kentucky and Tennessee agreed to adopt Walker's line as the boundary of the two States; but it was stipulated that all private rights and interests of land between the two lines, theretofore derived from either State, should be considered as rightfully emanating therefrom; but all vacant and unappropriated lands within those limits were declared to belong to Kentucky and subject to her disposal. No provision was made for cases of conflicting grants of the same land made by Virginia or Kentucky, on one side, and by North Carolina or Tennessee, on the other. The case before the court was one of that kind, the plaintiffs claiming under a Virginia warrant and a grant made by Kentucky in pursuance thereof, in 1796; the defendants claiming the same land under North Carolina grants made in 1786, 1792, 1797, and Tennessee grants of subsequent years; and the lands in controversy being situated between the two lines before mentioned. This court held that the parallel of 36° 30′ was always the true line until altered by agreement of the two States in 1820, and that the grants made by North Carolina and Tennessee, north of that line, were void, and that the Virginia and Kentucky grants were good, notwithstanding the actual occupation of the disputed territory by Tennessee. The adoption of Walker's line in 1820 was held to have changed the true and original boundary only for the purpose of future jurisdiction. Evidence of the previous exercise of jurisdiction by Tennessee up to Walker's line was not allowed to affect the question of title; although the defendants proved that North Carolina and Tennessee had claimed to Walker's line as the true line from the time it was run to the time of the Treaty or agreement of 1820; that the county lines of Tennessee were Walker's line on the north; that in her legislative, judicial and military capacity, Tennessee always claimed possession and acted up to said line as the northern boundary of the State; that process was executed, criminal acts were punished, taxes were paid, militia was enrolled, and all other acts done in subordination to the laws and government of Tennessee up to that line; and corresponding jurisdiction was exercised by Kentucky to the same line on the other side.

Here was a case of mistaken boundary, and when the error was discovered, the States concerned agreed to adopt it as the permanent political boundary for the future, conceding, on both sides, that it was not the true original boundary. Mr. Justice Story, delivering the opinion of the court, said: "Although, in the compact, Walker's line is agreed to be in future the boundary between the two States, it is not so established as having been for the past the true and rightful boundary; on the contrary, the compact admits the fact to be the other way. While the compact cedes to Tennessee the jurisdiction up to Walker's line, it cedes to Kentucky all the unappropriated lands north of the latitude of 36° 30′ north." Then, after further remarks of the same purport, follows the passage quoted by Chief Justice Taney, to the effect that the grants of North Carolina and Tennessee were not rightfully made, because they were originally beyond their territorial boundary.

The case of Poole v. Fleeger covers the case now under consideration. It was a case of disputed boundary, and Tennessee exercised sovereign jurisdiction de facto up to a certain line (Walker's) which she claimed to be the true boundary line, and made grants of land to that line, just as Georgia did in the present case to Watson's line. Walker's line, like Watson's, was found not to be the true line, and the grants made by Tennessee were found to be for lands in territory belonging to Kentucky; just as the grants of Georgia, next to Watson's line, were found to be for lands in the territory belonging to the United States and Florida. This court decided that the Tennessee grants were void, notwithstanding the exercise of sovereign jurisdiction de facto by that State over the territory in dispute, when the grants were made. If that decision was correct, the grant made by Georgia of the land in controversy must be held to be invalid for the same reason. The only difference between the cases is that Kentucky and Tennessee adopted the erroneous line as their permanent boundary, though recognizing the fact that it was not the true original line; whilst in the present case, Georgia and Florida adopted the nearest practicable approach to the true line as their permanent boundary. This difference does not affect the question, except to make the present case the stronger of the two.

The only authority cited by the Supreme Court of Florida for the proposition that a government de facto can make a valid grant is a dictum of Mr. Justice Baldwin, in delivering the opinion of the court in the case of Rhode Island v. Mass. 37 U. S. 12 Pet. 748 [9:1270]. The question there was, whether the people whose lands would be affected by the change of state line involved in that case ought to be made parties to the suit. Justice Baldwin says: "It is said that the people inhabiting the disputed territory ought to be made parties, as their rights are affected. It might with the same reason be objected that a treaty or compact, settling boundary, required the assent of the people to make it valid, and that a decree under the ninth article of confederation was void, as the authority to make it was derived from the legislative power only. The same objection was overruled in Penn v. Baltimore; and in Poole v. Fleeger, this court declared that an agreement between States, consented to by Congress, bound the citizens of each State." Thus far, the reasoning of the court was unanswerable. Settlements of boundary belong to the sovereign power, and cannot be questioned by individuals. But the learned Justice proceeds to lay down what he supposes to be two principles of the law of Nations, which were entirely unnecessary to the decision of the question of parties which he was considering. He says: "There are two principles of the law of Nations, which would protect them [private citizens] in their property: (1) That grants by a government de facto, of parts of a disputed territory in its possession, are valid against the State which had the right; De La Croix v. Chamberlain, 25 U. S. 12 Wheat. 600, 601 [6:742]; (2) That when a territory is acquired by treaty, cession, or even conquest, the rights of the inhabitants to property are respected and sacred. Johnson v. M'Intosh, 21 U. S. 8 Wheat. 589 [5: 692]," etc. This is the passage quoted and relied on by the Supreme Court of Florida.

The second of these propositions is in accordance with what we have already stated to be the received rule of international law; but the first is opposed to the cases which we have already cited in relation to Spanish grants in Mississippi and West Florida, and to the case of Poole v. Fleeger. As to the authority referred to (12 Wheat. 600, 601), it is a mere dictum of Mr. Justice Trimble in De la Croix v. Chamberlain, clearly inconsistent with the decision made at the same term in Henderson v. Poindexter's Lessee, and with all the subsequent decisions above referred to, and as Mr. Justice Catron, in a manuscript note upon this part of Justice Baldwin's opinion, justly remarks, "no such question was raised in that case, and Poole v. Fleeger is certainly to the contrary."

We think that the decision of the Supreme Court of Florida is erroneous in deciding against the title of the plaintiff in error. That title is claimed under a grant from the United States, of land acquired by Treaty with Spain, identified as such by the former Treaty of limits and the proceedings of the commissioners appointed to carry out that Treaty. The decision of the Supreme Court of Florida, in effect, is, either that the land was not embraced in the Treaty of cession, or, if it was, that the possession of Georgia gave a superior right. We think it clear that the land was embraced in the Treaty, and that the possession of Georgia did not give a superior right. The judgment is therefore reversed, and the cause remanded, with instructions to proceed according to law, in conformity with this opinion.

A point was made in the brief of counsel for defendants in error which was not raised in the courts below, and cannot, as now presented, be properly passed upon by us; namely, that the register had no power under the state law to make the bargain with McCall and Stripling for the sale of the land, at the time he issued his certificate to them. This is a question of state law, and involves an issue of fact, and, if deemed important, may be raised on a new trial of the cause, which will necessarily be awarded as a consequence of the reversal of the judgment.

ORIENT MUTUAL INSURANCE COMPANY, Plff. in Err.,

JOHN S. ADAMS ET AL.

Marine policies—misconduct of master—loss by derangement of mud valve—right of abandonment—rule as to.

1. In marine policies, a loss, whose proximate cause was a peril insured against, is within the protection of the policy, notwithstanding it may have been occasioned remotely by the negligence of the master and mariners.

2. The misconduct of the master unless affected by fraud or design will not defeat a recovery on the policy.

3. A loss which was the consequence of the derangement of the mud valve of a vessel, where such derangement was not the proximate cause of the loss, is not within the exception in the policy that the insurance company should be free of all claim for loss or damage occasioned by the derangement or breaking of the engine or machinery or any consequence resulting therefrom.

4. Where the contract of insurance provided that there should be no abandonment of the vessel unless it was impracticable to recover and repair it, and unless the damage amounted to 50 per cent of the agreed value, the right to abandon is to be determined from the facts as they existed on the day of abandonment.

5. If the facts present a case of extreme hazard and of probable expense exceeding half the value of the ship, the insured may abandon, although it should happen that she was afterwards recovered at a less expense.

Argued April 13, 1887. Decided Oct. 24, 1887.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Western District of Pennsylvania. Affirmed.

The defendants in error, as insured, sued the plaintiff in error, as insurer, in the circuit court, on a policy of marine insurance on the steamboat Alice, to recover for a total loss, and recovered judgment in the circuit court.

The questions in the case are:

1. Whether the loss, which was caused by the misconduct of the insured, is within the provisions of the policy.

2. Whether the loss is within the express exceptions of the policy.

3. Whether, if there was a loss, for which the insurer is liable, the insured had the right to abandon for a constructive total loss.

4. Whether certain evidence was improperly excluded.

The further facts are fully stated in the opinion.

Mr. James Lowndes, for plaintiff in error:

I. The loss was directly due to the misconduct of the insured himself, and was therefore not a loss insured against. There is no dispute about the facts that Adams, the co-owner, ordered The Alice to be let go when she had not sufficient steam in her boiler, and that the damage resulted from that act of the assured.

"The insured is never to be indemnified against his own act, nor against any loss caused by his own personal misconduct."

Parsons, Mar. Law, 11, 210; Arnould, Mar. Ins. 670.

Misconduct or gross negligence on the part of the assured, although falling short of fraud or design, discharges the insurer.

II. The court erred in refusing to rule that the damage was within the express exceptions of the policy.

III. There was no such partial loss as under the contract authorized an abandonment for a constructive total loss.

"Public policy requires no more than that a man be not suffered to insure against his own knavery, which is not to be protected or encouraged by any means; for though the maxim respondeat superior is applicable to the responsibility of a master for the acts of his servants, yet the insured, so long as he acts with fidelity, is answerable neither for his servants nor for himself."

The same doctrine was afterwards affirmed in Walker v. Maitland, 5 Barn. & Ald. 171, and Bishop v. Pentland, 7 Barn. & C. 219, and is now deemed incontrovertibly established. Mr. Justice Harlan delivered the opinion of the court:

This writ of error brings up for review a judgment against the Orient Mutual Insurance Company of New York upon a policy whereby that Company insured the defendants in error in the sum of $5,000, on the steamer Alice, of the agreed valuation of $27,000, against perils "of the seas, lakes, rivers, canals, fires, and jettisons that should come to the damage of said vessel or any part thereof."

The policy provided, among other things, that the Company should be free from all claim for loss or damage "arising from or caused by * * * barratry, * * * or occasioned by the bursting of boilers, the collapsing of flues, explosion of gunpowder, the derangement or breaking the engine or machinery, or any consequence resulting therefrom, unless the same be caused by unavoidable external violence;" that there should be "no abandonment as for a total loss on account of said vessel grounding or being otherwise detained, or in consequence of any loss or damage, unless the injury sustained be equivalent to 50 per centum of the agreed value in this policy; that the aforesaid vessel is, and shall be at all times during the continuance of this policy, tight and sound, sufficiently found in tackle and appurtenance thereto, competently provided with masters, officers, and crew, and in all things and means for the safe employment thereof;" and that "in no case whatever shall the assured have the right to abandon until it shall be ascertained that the recovery and repairs of said vessel are impracticable, nor sell the wreck, or any portion thereof, without the consent of the Company."

The insured sued as for a total loss arising from one of the perils specified in the policy.

The Company pleaded non assumpsit and payment, with leave to give in evidence the matters set forth in its affidavit of defense, which was adopted as a special plea. Those matters will sufficiently appear from the facts which will now be stated.

According to the bill of exceptions, there was evidence in behalf of the plaintiffs tending to show that, without willfulness or design on the part of her captain, the vessel was carried, April 28, 1880—before the expiration of the policy—over the falls of the Ohio River, at Louisville, Kentucky, and sunk, receiving damage in a sum equal to 50 per centum of her agreed value; and that on the 18th of May, 1880, it being apparently impracticable to float her off and repair her, the vessel was abandoned to the insurers as a total loss, and the sum due under the policy demanded.

The evidence introduced by the Company tended to establish these facts: The master of The Alice was C. F. Adams, one of the assured, and a son of the other plaintiff. Before the sailing of the vessel he had the reputation of being a "drinking" man, and of that fact his father was informed. On her arrival at Louisville, on the morning of April 28, 1880, the master gave the usual signal (which was transmitted to the engineer) that he had no present need of the engines. The joint of the mud valve was out of order, threatening damage to the freight, and making repairs necessary. The steam was thereupon blown off in order to make repairs. The captain, coming on board, saw that repairs were going on, and knew that the mud valve connected with the boiler needed repairs. The work of repairing made it necessary to blow off steam. The captain subsequently went on deck, and, without making inquiry of the engineer as to the condition of the steam or receiving any notice from him that steam was ready, tapped his bell at about 8.30 A. M. as a signal to let go the boat. At that time there was not sufficient steam to propel the vessel. It is the custom of the river for the master, before giving the order to let go, to inquire of the engineer as to the condition of the steam, and await his reply that the steam is ready before giving the order to let go. At the time of the accident the vessel was in a position to be carried over the falls, if she was let go without steam on. Upon being let go she was carried by the current down the river and over the falls, and, striking a pier, was badly damaged; in consequence of which she sunk soon thereafter below the bridge in about eighteen feet of water.

There was, also, evidence in behalf of the Company, tending to show that the vessel was but slightly injured, and, in the spring of 1881, was floated and removed from the place at which she sunk, and put in the condition in which she was before sinking, for a sum little less than $6,000; that when she was raised, the plaintiffs refused to pay the expense thereof; that after May 18, 1880, the plaintiffs sold her furniture and apparel without the Company's consent, and that on or about the 28th of April, 1880, they put her into the possession of the Cincinnati Underwriters' Wrecking Company, which thereafter had the right of possession until the vessel was seized by the United States Marshal under process, in December, 1880, upon maritime liens.

To further maintain the issues on its behalf, the defendant—the bill of exceptions states—produced in evidence an exemplification of the record of a certain cause, entitled "Cincinnati Underwriters' Company against The Steamer Alice," etc., in the United States District Court for the District of Kentucky, as tending to show that after the 18th May, 1880, the claimants, by the answers and petitions in that suit, claimed to be the owners of the vessel, her furniture, and apparel; that The Alice was subject to maritime liens, in a considerable sum, existing on the 18th of May, 1880; that she was sold under a decree to satisfy the same, the plaintiffs receiving a part of the proceeds of sale; that the plaintiffs admitted that she was slightly damaged, and they had refused, after she was raised, to pay the expense of raising her.

Thereupon the plaintiffs offered evidence tending to show that "it was the custom of the river that the engineer should give notice to the captain before exhausting steam, and that it was not the custom for the captain to have notice from the engineer that steam was ready before giving the order to let go."

The plaintiffs, in further reply, offered to prove by the plaintiff, C. F. Adams, "that the steamer, at the time of loss, was insured in seven companies for a total insurance of $18,000, and, after the notice of abandonment, six of them, representing an insurance of $13,000, settled with the insured, and, as part of the settlement, released to the latter all interest in the steamer as she lay; that after the Marshal's sale of the boat, the plaintiffs claimed to own the $\frac{1}{18}$ of the proceeds of sale, and that when the claim for the entire proceeds was made it was as to form, under the advice of counsel; but the plaintiffs did not intend thereby to waive the abandonment theretofore made, or to keep as against the Orient Insurance Company, the $\frac{5}{18}$ of the proceeds of sale." This was offered as bearing upon the question of waiver of abandonment of The Alice; to which offer the defendant objected; but the objection was overruled and the testimony of the witness admitted. The defendant excepted to the overruling of the objection and to the admission of the testimony.

The first assignment of error relates to the instructions upon the general question whether the insured, by anything done or omitted to be done, had defeated their right to recover on the policy. The court at the request of the plaintiffs, and against the objections of the Company, instructed the jury that "where a loss under a policy of insurance, such as the one in suit, happens from the perils of the river, it is not a defense to the insurance company that the remote cause of loss was the negligence of the insured or his agents;" and that "the mere fault or negligence of the captain of the vessel by which The Alice was drifted into the current and drawn over the falls, will not constitute a defense for the Company, unless the jury should be satisfied that the captain acted fraudulently or willfully, with design in so doing." The theory of the defense was disclosed by the request to instruct the jury that if they "are satisfied from the evidence that the accident and loss was caused by the misconduct of Captain Charles F. Adams, that then the plaintiff cannot recover." This request was denied, but the court said to the jury: "This is true if the jury is satisfied that the conduct of the captain is properly characterized. If he designedly or recklessly exposed the vessel to the dangers of navigation at the falls, knowing that she was not in a condition to encounter them, he was guilty of misconduct such as would relieve the defendant from liability; but if the proximate cause of the loss was the stranding of the vessel, this was covered by the policy, and the defendant is not relieved from liability by showing that the loss was remotely ascribable to the negligence of the captain or the other officers or employés."

We not perceive anything in these instructions of which the Insurance Company can rightfully complain. The court proceeded upon the ground that, if the efficient, and, therefore, proximate cause of the loss was a peril of the river, the Company could not escape liability by showing that the loss was remotely caused by mere negligence in not ascertaining, before giving the signal to let the vessel go, that she had steam enough for her proper management. The court committed no error in so ruling. In Columbia Ins. Co. v. Lawrence, 35 U. S. 10 Pet. 517 [9:516], which was a case of insurance against fire on land, the court said that "A loss by fire, occasioned by the mere fault or negligence of the assured, or his servants or agents, and without fraud or design, is a loss within the policy, upon the general ground that the fire is the proximate cause of the loss, and also upon the general ground that the express exceptions in policies against fire leave this within the scope of the general terms of such policies." In the subsequent case of Waters v. Merchants' Louisville Ins. Co. 36 U. S. 11 Pet. 224 [9:696], it was said, in reference to the case of Columbia Ins. Co. v. Lawrence, that "The court then thought that in marine policies, whether containing the risk of barratry or not, a loss whose proximate cause was a peril insured against is within the protection of the policy, notwithstanding it might have been occasioned remotely by the negligence of the master and mariners." To the same effect are Patapsco Ins. Co. v. Coulter, 28 U. S. 3 Pet. 237 [7:665]; General Mut. Ins. Co. v. Sherwood, 55 U. S. 14 How. 352 [14:452], and Phœnix Ins. Co. v. Erie & W. Trans. Co. 117 U. S. 325 [29:879].

But it is insisted that the court should have granted the request of the Company to the effect that it was not liable if the accident and loss were caused by the "misconduct" of the master. Had that request been granted, in the form asked, the jury might have supposed that the Company was relieved from liability if the master was chargeable with what is sometimes described as gross negligence as distinguished from simple negligence. Hence the court properly said, in effect, that the misconduct of the master, unless affected by fraud or design, would not defeat a recovery on the policy. The principle upon which the court below acted was that expressed by Chief Justice Gibson in American Ins. Co. v. Insley, 7 Pa. 229, when he said that "Public policy requires no more than that a man be not suffered to insure against his own knavery, which is not to be protected or encouraged by any means; for though the maxim respondeat superior is applicable to the responsibility of a master for the acts of his servants, yet the insured, so long as he acts with fidelity, is answerable neither for his servants nor for himself." Williams v. Suffolk Ins. Co. 3 Sumn. 276.

The next assignment of error is that the court erred in ruling that the loss was not within the express exceptions of the policy. The specification, under this assignment is, that the loss was the consequence of the derangement of the mud valve, and, therefore, within the exception that the Company should be free of all claim for loss or damage occasioned by "the derangement or breaking of the engine or machinery, or any consequence resulting therefrom." The "consequence" here referred to is an immediate or proximate, not a remote consequence. Even if the mud valve is a part of the machinery of the vessel, within the meaning of the policy, its derangement cannot be said to have been the proximate cause of the loss. So far as the bills of exception show, the repairs of the mud valve had been completed before the order was given to let the vessel go.

It is also contended that the court erred in its instructions as to the abandonment of the vessel by the plaintiffs. The court told the jury, in substance, that the assured were entitled to abandon the vessel if, on May 18, 1880, it was impracticable to recover and repair it, and if the damage from the perils of the river amounted to 50 per cent of the agreed value; that the right to abandon was to be determined from the facts as they existed on that day; that if the right then existed, and the plaintiffs availed themselves of it, the subsequent floating off of the vessel in the winter or spring of 1881 would not change the result; and that, in determining whether the injuries to the vessel from the perils of the river were to the extent of 50 per cent of her agreed value, the jury should take into consideration the "place where The Alice lay, and the uncertainty as to when (if at all) a rise would come to float her off, and all other circumstances in the case."

The argument in behalf of the Company is that these instructions disregarded the express terms of the contract between the parties; that while the rule laid down by the court made the probability of the stipulated loss, at the time of abandonment, the test of the right to abandon, the policy made the actual existence of the stipulated proportion of loss the ground of the exercise of that right. We do not think the court mistook the meaning of the contract or erroneously instructed the jury. The jury were distinctly told that the right to abandon depended upon the fact that it was impracticable to recover and repair the vessel. But how were the jury to determine the existence of that fact? The contract provided, as a condition precedent to the right to abandon, that it be "ascertained that the recovery and repairs of said vessel are impracticable." But in what mode ascertained? How was the insured to determine whether the recovery and repair of the vessel was impracticable at the time of abandonment? Why, manifestly, as the jury were told, by taking into consideration where the vessel lay, the uncertainty as to when (if at all) a rise would come to float her off, and all the other attendant circumstances. While the damage must at the time have been equivalent to 50 per cent of the agreed value, and while the fact that the repairs subsequently made amounted to only $6,000 tended to show that the actual damage was not so great as claimed, that fact is not decisive of the right to abandon. For, as said in Bradlie v. Maryland Ins. Co. 37 U. S. 12 Pet. 378, 397 [9: 1123, 1131], "If the abandonment when made is good, the rights of the parties are definitely fixed, and do not become changed by subsequent events; if, on the other hand, the abandonment when made is not good, subsequent circumstances will not affect it so as, retroactively, to impart to it a validity which it had not at the origin." Rhinelander v. Pennsylvania Ins. Co. 8 U. S. 4 Cranch, 29 [2: 540]; Marshall v. Delaware Ins. Co. Id. 202 [2: 596].

Again: "In many cases of stranding, the state of the vessel at the time may be such, from the imminency of the peril and the apparent extent of expenditures required to deliver her from it, as to justify an abandonment; although by some fortunate occurrence she may be delivered from her peril without an actual expenditure of one half of her value after she is in safety. Under such circumstances, if, in all human probability, the expenditures which must be incurred to deliver her from her peril are, at the time, so far as any reasonable calculations can be made, in the highest degree of probability, beyond half value, and if her distress and peril be such as would induce a considerate owner, uninsured, and upon the spot, to withhold any attempt to get the vessel off, because of such apparently great expenditures, the abandonment would doubtless be good."

In the same case the court quotes with approval the following language of Kent:

"The right of abandonment does not depend upon the certainty, but on the high probability, of a total loss, either of the property or of the voyage, or both. The insured is to act, not upon certainties, but upon probabilities, and if the facts present a case of extreme hazard and of probable expense, exceeding half the value of the ship, the insured may abandon; though it should happen that she was afterwards recovered at a less expense." 3 Kent, 321.

In this connection it is assigned for error that the court erred in ruling that the fact of the actual repair of the vessel for less than 50 per centum of her agreed value was not evidence relevant to the issue as to the amount of damage done to The Alice. This statement as to the ruling of the court is scarcely accurate. The court refused, and properly, to tell the jury that the fact that the vessel was recovered and repaired was "the best evidence" that it was practicable to recover and repair it. That fact, however, went to the jury as evidence, and they were at liberty, under the instructions, to give it due weight in connection with all the other circumstances, in determining whether the recovery and repair of the vessel were, within the principles announced in other instructions, impracticable at the time of the abandonment.

Upon the whole case we are of opinion that no error of law was committed to the prejudice of the Company, and the judgment is affirmed.

JOHN M. LOCKHART.

Removal of cause from state court—prohibitions against—appeal from order.

1. Under the Act of 1887, which provides that whenever any cause shall be removed from any state court into any Circuit Court of the United States, and the circuit court shall decide that the cause was improperly removed, and order the same to be remanded to the state court, the action of the circuit court remanding the cause is final and not the subject of review in this court.

2. The prohibitions against appeal and writs of error in the Act of 1887 apply not only to removals on account of prejudice or local influence, but also to removals for other causes.

3. No appeal from an order of the circuit court remanding a suit lies to this court under section 698 of the Revised Statutes. The order of the circuit court remanding the cause to the state court is not a final judgment in the action but a refusal to hear and decide.

Submitted Oct. 18, 1887. Decided Oct. 24, 1887.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Louisiana from an order of the Circuit Court remanding a suit which was begun and had been removed from a state court after the Act of March 3, 1887, chap. 373, 24 Stat. at L. 552, went into effect.

On motion to dismiss. Granted.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. William A. Maury, Eugene D. Saunders and E. D. White, for appellee, for the motion:

Under the express terms of the Judiciary Act of March 3, 1887, this court is without jurisdiction to review, in any form of appellate proceedings, a judgment of a circuit court remanding a case from such court to the state court in which it originated.

The Act of 1887 gives the right to remove in cases not federal to defendants being nonresidents of that State, i. e., of the State in which the suit is brought.

But it is contended that the Act of 1875 is not, on this point, repealed by the Act of 1887.

This contention is based on what we consider is a misapprehension of the principles of interpretation announced in the case of Hess v. Reynolds, 113 U. S. 78 (28: 928). That case, together with the case of King v. Cornell, 106 U. S. 395 (27: 60), indeed settle this matter in the opposite sense to that for which our opponents contend.

The Act of 1875 contains no clause regulating or referring to the removal of cases under the Local Prejudice Act.

Hess v. Reynolds is not in conflict with the decision in King v. Cornell, because they were on different states of facts. Each case is authority in the appropriate state of facts and law.

Baltimore & O. R. R. Co. v. Bates, 119 U. S. 467 (30: 438).

The Act of 1887 contains an express regulation of these matters, and is later in date than that contained in the Act of 1875. And the principle announced in King v. Cornell is that the latter supersedes the former.

Messrs. J. D. Rouse and William Grant, for appellant:

This case comes before this court upon a division of opinion, duly certified under the provisions of section 652, R. S., an appeal having been taken from a final decree in the cause, under section 698, R. S. The latter section expressly confers jurisdiction upon this court to review "Any final judgment or decree in any civil suit or proceeding before a circuit court," under the circumstances named in the statute.

It is an advisory jurisdiction, and prior to the Act of June 1, 1872, 17 Stat. at L. 196, was exercised only by answering the question certified. The determination of the question certified did not affect the right to bring up the whole case after it was terminated in the court below.

Daniels v. Chicago & R. I. R. R. Co. 70 U. S. 3 Wall. 255 (18: 225); Ward v. Chamberlain, 67 U. S. 2 Black, 435 (17: 323); U. S. v. Bailey, 34 U. S. 9 Pet. 267 (9: 124).

Under the Act of April 29, 1802, 2 Stat. at L. 159), the cause might proceed in the circuit court after the division arose and the question was certified, without awaiting a decision thereof, provided further proceedings could be had without prejudice to the merits.

The question was to be stated and certified only upon "the request of either party or their counsel." But the Act of 1872 postponed the certificate until a final judgment, decree or order is entered in the suit, and makes it mandatory upon the judges then to certify any question upon which they differed in opinion, which might have been reviewed under the Act of 1802.

All such cases may now be removed to this court by writ of error or appeal, according to the nature of the case. "This is the only material change from the original law."

The jurisdiction to answer the question certified was not dependent upon the amount in dispute, as in other cases, but was conferred in all cases without regard thereto.

This case was removed into the circuit court, under the provisions of section 2 of the Act of March 3, 1875.

The judges were divided in opinion whether such a suit could be removed since the passage of the Act of March 3, 1887. The latter Act declares in its title that it is amendatory of the Act of 1875.

"If, by any reasonable construction, the two statutes can stand together, they must so stand. If harmony is impossible, and only in that event, the former law is repealed in part or wholly, as the case may be."

State v. Stoll, 84 U. S. 17 Wall. 425 (21: 650).

This is an appeal from an order of the circuit court remanding a suit which was begun and had been removed from a state court after the Act of March 3, 1887, chap. 373, 24 Stat. at L. 552, went into effect. At the hearing of the motion the judges holding the circuit court differed in opinion, and the order to remand was made under section 650 of the Revised Statutes in accordance with the opinion of the presiding judge. The question as to which the difference of opinion arose was duly certified and recorded, and this appeal was taken from the order which was entered. A motion is now made to dismiss because an appeal does not lie in such a case.

Before the Act of March 3, 1875, there could be no appeal from an order of the circuit court remanding a suit which had been removed, because such an order was not a final judgment or decree in the sense which authorizes an appeal or writ of error. Chicago & A. R. R. Co. v. Wiswall, 90 U. S. 23 Wall. 507 [23: 108]. That Act, however, provided in express terms that "The order of said circuit court dismissing or remanding said cause to the state court shall be reviewable by the supreme court on writ of error or appeal, as the case may be" (18 Stat. at L. 470, chap. 137, last paragraph of § 5); and under this authority numerous cases have been brought to this court by appeal or writ of error for the review of such orders. But, by section 6 of the Act of 1887, chap. 373, the last paragraph of section 5 of that of 1875, chap. 137, was expressly repealed; and in the last paragraph of section 2 of the Act of 1887 it was enacted that "Whenever any cause shall be removed from any state court into any Circuit Court of the United States, and the circuit court shall decide that the cause was improperly removed, and order the same to be remanded to the state court from whence it came, such remand shall be immediately carried into execution, and no appeal or writ of error from the decision of the circuit court so remanding such case shall be allowed." It is difficult to see what more could be done to make the action of the circuit court final, for all the purposes of the removal, and not the subject of review in this court. First, it is declared that there shall be no appeal or writ of error in such a case, and then, to make the matter doubly sure, the only statute which ever gave the right of such an appeal or writ of error is repealed.

It is contended, however, that the prohibitions against appeals and writs of error in the Act of 1887 apply only to removals on account of prejudice or local influence, but that cannot be so. The section of the statute in which the provision occurs has relation to removals generally, those for prejudice or local influence as well as those for other causes, and the prohibition has no words of limitation. It is in effect that no appeal or writ of error shall be allowed from an order to remand in "any cause" removed "from any state court into any Circuit Court of the United States." The fact that it is found at the end of the section, and immediately after the provision for removals on account of prejudice or local influence, has, to our minds, no special significance. Its language is broad enough to cover all cases, and such was evidently the purpose of Congress.

It is also contended that the appeal lies under section 693 of the Revised Statutes, on account of the certificate in the record of the judges holding the court that their opinions were opposed upon the question of remanding. That section is as follows: "Any final judgment or decree in any civil suit or proceeding before a circuit court * * * wherein the said judges certify, as provided by law, that their opinions were opposed, * * * may be reviewed and affirmed, reversed or modified by the supreme court, on writ of error or appeal, according to the nature of the case, and subject to the provisions of law applicable to other writs of error or appeals in regard to bail and supersedeas." But here there has been no judgment in the suit, and therefore this section does not apply. That was the ground on which an appeal was denied in Chicago & A. R. R. Co. v. Wiswall, supra, where it was said: "The order of the circuit court remanding the cause to the state court is not a 'final judgment' in the action, but a refusal to hear and decide." No case can be brought up under section 693 until there has been a final judgment or decree in the suit.

It follows that we have no jurisdiction of this appeal, and the motion to dismiss is consequently granted.

STATE OF LOUISIANA.

Jurisdiction of court of claims—action by State against United States—Statute of Limitations.

1. The court of claims has jurisdiction of an action by a State against the United States for a demand arising upon an Act of Congress.
2. The action of a State in the court of claims to recover moneys received by the United States from sales of swamp lands granted to the State by the Act of September 28, 1850, is not barred by the Statute of Limitations until six years after the amount is ascertained from proofs of the sales before the Commissioner of the General Land-Office.
3. The direct tax laid by the Act of August 5, 1861, did not create any liability on the part of the States, in which the lands taxed were situated, to pay the tax.

Submitted Oct. 11, 1887. Decided Oct. 24, 1887.

APPEAL from the Court of Claims. Affirmed.

The case is stated by the court.

Messrs. A. H. Garland, Atty-Gen., and Heber J. May, Asst. Atty-Gen., for appellant:

The court of claims has neither original nor concurrent jurisdiction to hear and determine a cause in which a State is a party in a suit against the United States.

Power is conferred upon the court of claims to decide the claims of individuals against the United States, but not to determine claims between States and Nations.

We are not bound by the decisions made in the three cases mentioned in the opinion in which States were parties, but in which the question of jurisdiction was not raised. No appeals were taken.

State of New Hampshire v. United States, 20 Ct. Cl. 342, 394.

As to the items making up the claim for indemnity for swamp lands, the court of claims was without jurisdiction. The petition was not filed within six years after the claim first accrued.

By the Act of March 3, 1857, the provisions of the Act of March 2, 1855, are continued in force, and special reference is made therein to the Act granting the swamp lands to the State of Louisiana, approved March 2, 1849, 9 Stat. at L. 352.

Inasmuch as the tracts of land were sold prior to the passage of the Act of Congress approved March 3, 1857, by which the provisions of the Act of March 2, 1855, were extended, the claims which are founded on these two statutes did not accrue later than March 3, 1857.

They are presented here as claims founded upon such laws under section 1059, Revised Statutes. The petition was filed September 20, 1886, nearly thirty years after such claims accrued under the statutes, and more than thirty years after the sale of such lands.

A claim first accrues, within the meaning of the statute, when suit may first be brought upon it, and from that day the six years' limitation begins to run.

The appellee relies on the provisions of the Statutes of 1850, 1855, and 1857 for its remedy to prosecute the claim in this court under section 1059, Revised Statutes. Such being the fact, there is nothing to exclude the claim from the provisions of section 1069, Revised Statutes.

The agent of the State of Louisiana never furnished the proof required by section 2 of the Act of 1855.

Any delay in the adjustment and payment of this part of the claim is clearly to be attributed to the appellee, and of such delay it cannot take advantage.

The inaction was entirely on the part of the State. No proof was furnished until, by lapse of time, the Statute of Limitation became a bar to the jurisdiction of the court, if, in fact, such jurisdiction ever attached.

The Commissioner of the General Land-Office cannot abrogate or extend the Statute of Limitations.

The right of action, if it ever accrued in the court of claims in relation to the claim under consideration, accrued March 3, 1855, and the Statute of Limitations began to run against it from the same date.

The grant is an absolute gift, coupled with the provision that so much thereof as may be necessary shall be used for the purpose named.

The fund is not, therefore, held by the appellant in trust for the State for the purpose of having it specifically applied.

The Commissioner of the General Land-Office is directed and authorized by Congress to pay to the States, upon due proof, the purchase money. This is all there is of the law. No express trust is declared, and none can well be implied.

The Government is not a trustee of every fund that happens to fall into its possession.

Five Per Cent Cases, 110 U. S. 471 (28: 198).

The part of the final judgment based on Finding 1 of the court is erroneous, because the claim was within the exclusive jurisdiction of the Commissioner of the General Land-Office, under section 2 of the Act of March 2, 1855, 10 Stat. at L. 634.

When the law has confided to a special tribunal the authority to hear and determine certain matters arising in the course of its duties, the decisions of the tribunal, within the scope of its authority, is conclusive upon all others.

Mr. William G. Earle, for appellee:

The attempted set-off is illegal. There is no mutuality between the parties.

Beauregard v. Case, 91 U. S. 141 (23: 263).

These two causes of action are trust funds.

Whilst the statute gave to the State the right of making proofs, etc., this was conferred only as an additional protection and safeguard to the rights vested in the State by the Acts.

The Commissioner of the General Land-Office has exclusive jurisdiction in all matters "Appertaining to the surveying and sale of the public lands of the United States," and power to "audit and settle all public accounts relating to the public lands."

See Baldwin v. Starks, 107 U. S. 465 (27: 527); Marquez v. Frisbie, 101 U. S. 473 (25: 800); Shepley v. Cowan, 91 U. S. 331 (23: 424).

The repudiation of a trust must be clearly and unequivocally made known to the cestui que trust.

Speidel v. Henrici, 120 U. S. 386 (30: 719).

There could be no bar of the statute until knowledge was brought home to the Governor of Louisiana that the United States had repudiated the trust by entering it as a credit in the treasury department.

The original jurisdiction of the supreme court is not made exclusive by the Constitution.

Ames v. Kansas, 111 U. S. 449 (28: 482); Börs v. Preston, 111 U. S. 253 (28: 420).

The court of claims has jurisdiction to hear and determine all claims founded upon any law of Congress, or upon any regulation of an Executive Department, or upon any contract, expressed or implied, with the Government of the United States, and all claims which may be referred to it by either House of Congress. A State may maintain an action to enforce its rights.

1 Dill. Mun. Corp. § 14, p. 106.

Mr. Justice Field delivered the opinion of the court:

This action was brought in the court of claims by the State of Louisiana against the United States, to recover two demands, amounting in the aggregate to the sum of $71,385.83. The first of these demands arises upon the Act of Congress of February 20, 1811, "To enable the people of the Territory of Orleans to form a Constitution and State Government," the fifth section of which declared that 5 per cent of the net proceeds of the sales of lands of the United States, within her limits, after the first day of January next ensuing, should be applied to laying out and constructing public roads and levees in the State, as its Legislature might direct. 2 Stat. at L. 641, chap. 21. Pursuant to the authority thus conferred, the people of the Territory of Orleans, represented in a convention called for that purpose, formed themselves into a State, by the name of Louisiana, and adopted a constitution under which the State was admitted into the Union. The 5 per cent of the net proceeds of sales of lands of the United States, made between July 1, 1882, and June 30, 1886, and due to the State by the United States, as found by the Commissioner of the General Land-Office, amounted to $47,530.79.

The second of these demands arises upon the Act of Congress of September 28, 1850, "To enable the State of Arkansas and other States to reclaim the swamp lands within their limits," 9 Stat. at L. 519, chap. 84, and the Act of March 2, 1855, "For the relief of purchasers and locators of swamp and overflowed lands." 10 Stat. at L. 634, chap. 147. The Act of September 28, 1850, granted to the States then in the Union all the swamp and overflowed lands, made unfit thereby for cultivation, within their limits, which at the time remained unsold. The second section made it the duty of the Secretary of the Interior, as soon as practicable after the passage of the Act, to prepare a list of the lands described and transmit the same to the Governor of the State, and at his request to cause a patent to be issued therefor. It would seem that this duty was not discharged; and, notwithstanding the grant was one in præsenti, many of the lands falling within the designation of swamp and overflowed lands were sold to other parties by the United States. The Act of March 2, 1855, was designed to correct, among other things, the wrong thus done to the State; it provided that, upon due proof of such sales, by the authorized agent of the State, before the Commissioner of the General Land-Office, the purchase money of the lands should be paid over to the State. Such proof was not made, but equivalent proof was submitted to the commissioner as to the character of the lands from the field notes of the Surveyor-General of the State. This mode of proof was accepted by the commissioner in other cases as early as 1850. The amount found in this way by the commissioner on the 30th of June, 1885, to be due to the State from the United States, on account of sales of swamp lands to individuals, made prior to March 3, 1857, was $23,855.04.

It does not appear that there was any serious contest in the court of claims, either as to the validity or the amount of these demands; but it was objected that the demand arising upon the Acts of September 28, 1850, and of March 2, 1855, was barred by the Statute of Limitations, and that both demands were set off by the unpaid balance of the direct tax levied under the Act of August 5, 1861, 12 Stat. at L. 292, which was apportioned to the State of Louisiana. The First Comptroller of the Treasury had, at different times previous to the commencement of this action, admitted and certified that the sums claimed were due to the State on account of the 5 per cent net proceeds of sales of the public lands, and on account of sales of swamp lands within the State purchased by individuals; but had directed the amounts to be credited to the State on account upon the claim of the United States against her for the unpaid portion of the direct tax mentioned.

It was also objected in the court of claims, and the objection is renewed here, that that court had no jurisdiction, under the Constitution and laws of the United States, to hear and determine a cause in which the State is a party in a suit against the United States. This objection, therefore, must first be examined; for, if well taken, it will be unnecessary to consider the other questions presented.

The Constitution declares that "The judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one supreme court, and such inferior courts as Congress may from time to time ordain and establish," and "that the judicial power shall extend to all cases in law and equity arising under this Constitution, the laws of the United States, and treaties made or which shall be made under their authority; to all cases affecting ambassadors, other public ministers, and consuls; to all cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction; to controversies to which the United States shall be a party; to controversies between two or more States; between a State and citizens of another State; between citizens of different States; between citizens of the same State claiming lands under grants of different States; and between a State or the citizens thereof and foreign States, citizens, or subjects." This clause was modified by the 11th Amendment, declaring that "the judicial power shall not be construed to extend to any suit in law or equity, commenced or prosecuted against one of the United States by citizens of another State, or by citizens or subjects of any foreign State."

As thus modified, the clause prescribes the limits of the judicial power of the courts of the United States. The action before us, being one in which the United States have consented to be sued, falls within those designated, to which the judicial power extends; for, as already stated, both of the demands in controversy arise under laws of the United States. Congress has brought it within the jurisdiction of the court of claims by the express terms of the statute defining the powers of that tribunal, unless the fact that a State is the petitioner draws it within the original jurisdiction of the supreme court. The same article of the Constitution which defines the extent of the judicial power of the courts of the United States declares, that "In all cases affecting ambassadors, other public ministers, and consuls, and those in which a State shall be a party, the supreme court shall have original jurisdiction; in all the other cases, the supreme court shall have appellate jurisdiction, both as to law and fact, with such exceptions and under such regulations as the Congress shall make." Although the original jurisdiction of the supreme court, where a State is a party, as thus appears, is not in terms made exclusive, there were some differences of opinion among the earlier judges of this court whether this exclusive character did not follow from a proper construction of the article. In a recent case, Ames v. Kansas, 111 U. S. 449 [28: 482], this question was very fully examined, and the conclusion reached that the original jurisdiction of the supreme court, in cases where a State is a party, is not made exclusive by the Constitution and that it is competent for Congress to authorize suits by a State to be brought in the inferior courts of the United States. In that case, it is true, the action was commenced by the State in one of her own courts, and, on motion of the defendant, was removed to the Circuit Court of the United States, and the question was as to the validity of this removal. The case having arisen under the laws of the United States, it was one of the class which could be thus removed, if the circuit court could take jurisdiction of an action in which the State was a party. It was held that the circuit court could take jurisdiction of an action of that character, and the removal was sustained. The Judiciary Act of 1789, it is true, declares that "The supreme court shall have exclusive jurisdiction of all controversies of a civil nature where a State is a party, except between a State and its citizens, or between a State and citizens of other States, or aliens, in which latter cases it shall have original but not exclusive jurisdiction." This clause, however, cannot have any application to suits against the United States, for such suits were not then authorized by any law of Congress. There could, then, be no controversies of a civil nature against the United States cognizable by any court where a State was a party. The Act of March 2, 1875, in extending the jurisdiction of the circuit court to all cases arising under the Constitution or laws of the United States, does not exclude any parties from being plaintiffs. Whether the State could thereafter prosecute the United States upon any demand in the circuit court, or the court of claims, depended only upon the consent of the United States, they not being amenable to suit except by such consent. Having consented to be sued in the court of claims, upon any claim founded upon a law of Congress, there is no more reason why the jurisdiction of the court should not be exercised when a State is a party, than when a private person is the suitor. The statute makes no exception of this kind, and this court can create none.

The Statute of Limitations does not seem to us to have any application to the demand arising upon the Swamp-Land Acts. The Act of 1850 contemplates that the Secretary of the Interior will identify the lands described, and although the State could not be deprived of her rights by the inaction of that officer, Wright v. Roseberry, 121 U. S. 488, 501 [30: 1039, 1042], she was not obliged to proceed in their assertion in the absence of such identification. By the Act of 1855, which provided for the payment to the State of moneys received by the United States on the sales of swamp lands within her limits, the payment was made to depend upon proof of the sales by the authorized agent of the State before the Commissioner of the General Land-Office. No such proof was ever made or offered, and, therefore, until in some other equally convincing mode the swampy character of the lands sold was established to the satisfaction of the commissioner, no definite ascertainment of the amount due to the State was had, so as to constitute a ground of action for its recovery in the court of claims. The method of proving the character of such lands by having recourse to the field notes of the public surveys of the Surveyor-General of the State was adopted by the commissioner as early as 1850, and was followed by him in this case in 1885. On the 30th of June of that year, he found in this mode and certified that there was due to the State from such sales the amount stated above. From that date only the six years within which the action could be brought in the court of claims began to run; and this action was commenced in September of the following year.

Nor do we regard the unpaid portion of the direct tax laid by the Act of Congress, of August 5, 1861, which was apportioned to Louisiana, as constituting any debt to the United States by the State in her political and corporate character, which can be set off against her demands. 12 Stat. at L. 292, chap. 45. That Act imposed an annual direct tax of twenty millions "upon the United States," and apportioned it to the several States of the Union. It directed that the tax should "be assessed and laid on the value of all lands and lots of ground, with their improvements and dwelling houses." § 13. It was assessed and laid upon the real property of private individuals in the States. Public property of the States and of the United States was exempted from the tax. Its apportionment was merely a designation of the amount which was to be levied upon and collected from this property of individuals in the several States, respectively. The provisions of the Act are inconsistent with any theory of the obligation of the States to pay the sums levied. It provides for the appointment of officers to assess the property to the different holders, and to collect the tax, and directs with minute detail the proceedings to be taken to enforce the collection, either by a distraint and sale of the personal property of the owners, or, that failing, by a sale of the real property taxed. It allows, it is true, the different States to assume the amounts apportioned to them respectively, and to collect the same in their own way by their own officers. Many of the States did thus assume the amounts, and in such cases it may well be considered that for the sums assumed they became debtors to the United States, and, so far as any portion of those sums has not been paid, that they still remain debtors. But, unless such assumption was had, no liability attached to any State in her political and corporate character. The liability was upon the individual land owners within her limits. The Act declares that the amount of the taxes assessed "shall be and remain a lien upon all lands and other real estate of the individuals who may be assessed for the same during two years after the time it shall annually become due and payable." § 33. Louisiana never assumed the payment of the taxes apportioned to her, or of any portion of them. She allowed the Government to proceed by its officers to collect the tax from the property holders. The amount apportioned to her was $385,886.67; the amount collected from the owners of land was $314,500.84, leaving only a balance of $71,385.83. It is not for us to suggest in what way this balance may be collected. After the war, the Secretary of the Treasury was authorized to suspend the collection of the tax in any of the States previously declared in insurrection, until January, 1868, and subsequently this authority was extended to January, 1869. 14 Stat. at L. 331, § 14; 15 Stat. at L. 260, chap. 69. The secretary acted upon this authority, and suspended the collection. It is stated that, since 1869, no attempts have been made by the Executive Department to enforce its collection in those States. Be that as it may, it is enough for the disposition of the present case, that the unpaid balance of the tax apportioned to Louisiana constitutes no debt on the part of the State in her political and corporate character to the United States.

We perceive no error in the judgment of the court below, and it is, therefore, affirmed.

CHARLES E. SIMMONS, Trustee, ET AL.

When decree is interlocutory and not final.

When an action has been brought in the United States Circuit Court, by a junior mortgagee, against the mortgagor and a prior mortgagee, to foreclose his mortgage, and to establish his right to redeem the prior mortgage, and such right to redeem has been established by a decree of that court but the amount he must pay has not been determined, and the amount due on his mortgage has been declared, but what that amount is has not been fixed by the decree, the decree is interlocutory only and not final for the purposes of an appeal, and an appeal therefrom will be dismissed.

This is a motion to dismiss an appeal because the decree appealed from is not final but interlocutory only. The case is in substance this:

A bill was filed by a junior mortgagee against the mortgagor and a prior mortgagee to foreclose his mortgage and to establish his right to redeem the prior mortgage. The defense was that under certain proceedings had for the foreclosure of the prior mortgage his right to redeem had been cut off, and the mortgaged property sold free of his lien. The decree appealed from finds: (1) That the junior mortgage is still a valid and subsisting lien, and that the right of its trustee and beneficiaries to redeem had not been cut off by the proceedings for the foreclosure of the earlier mortgage; (2) That those claiming title under the sale upon the foreclosure of that mortgage, and certain other parties, are entitled to redeem the junior mortgage "by paying off the amount due." thereon, "at such time as shall hereafter be fixed and determined by a further order or decree to be entered in this cause;" (3) In case none of the parties claiming under the prior mortgage redeem the junior mortgage, and the junior mortgagee redeems the prior one, then that the junior mortgage shall be foreclosed and a sale of the property "shall be had under a decree to be entered by this court," and the proceeds shall be applied, first, "to paying off the amount paid to redeem from the first" mortgage; second, the amount found due on the second mortgage; and the balance, if any, paid to the mortgagor; (4) "In the event that none of these parties shall redeem from the others, * * * then a sale" of the mortgaged property "shall be had pursuant to such decree as may hereafter be entered herein, and from the proceeds shall be paid off, first, the amount which it may be hereafter determined is due on the first" mortgage; "second * * * the amount which it may hereafter be determined is due on the second" mortgage; and third, the balance, if any, to the mortgagor.

It was then ordered that, "for the purpose of determining the amount necessary to be paid by any of the parties in making redemption, as herein provided," the cause be referred to a master "to find and report" the amount due on both the first and the second mortgages in accordance with certain principles of accounting which were specifically stated. The whole then concludes as follows: "This decree being interlocutory, it is ordered that said cause stand continued for further order and decree." From this decree the appeal was taken.

The case is reported as Simmons v. Taylor, 23 Fed. Rep. 849.

The rulings at the last term in Parsons v. Robinson, 122 U. S. 112 [30:1123] are decisive of this motion. The right of the junior mortgagee to redeem the prior mortgage has been established by the decree appealed from, but the amount he must pay has not been determined. The validity of his lien as security for the amount due on his mortgage has been declared, but what that amount is has not been fixed. His right to a sale of the mortgaged property in case the debt is not paid has been settled but such a sale cannot be made until a further order to that effect is entered. The litigation has not been ended; the terms of the redemption have not been fixed, and the foreclosure sale awaits the further judicial action of the court. In short, nothing can be done towards carrying the decree into effect until the "further order or decree" for which the cause was continued. This is shown more than once on the face of the decree, and consequently the decree is in fact, what the court took care to say it was, "interlocutory" only, and not final for the purposes of an appeal.

It is suggested in the brief of counsel for the appellant that the cases of First Nat. Bk. of Cleveland v. Shedd, 121 U. S. 74 [30: 877] and Parsons v. Robinson, supra, are in conflict, but this is a mistake. In Shedd's Case there was a decree of sale absolutely and without reserve, which could be carried into execution at once and when a purchaser acquired title under it, he would have held as against all the parties to the suit, no matter what might be the rulings on the other questions in the case which were reserved for further adjudication. The language of the decree, as shown at page 84 [881], was to the effect "that the whole property be sold as an entirety, * * * and that upon a confirmation of the sale the purchaser be entitled to a conveyance freed and discharged of the lien of the mortgages, receiver's certificates, costs, expenses, etc." Such a decree was surely final for the purposes of an appeal within the rule as stated in Forgay v. Conrad, 47 U S. 6 How. 201 [12:404], where it is said, at page 204 [405]: "When the decree decides the right to the property in contest, and directs it to be delivered up by the defendant to the complainant, or directs it be sold, or directs the defendant to pay a certain sum of money to the complainant, and the complainant is entitled to have such a decree carried immediately into execution, the decree must be considered as a final one to that extent, and authorizes an appeal to this court, although so much of the bill is retained in the circuit court as is necessary for the purpose of adjusting by a further decree the accounts between the parties pursuant to the decree passed." To the same effect are Ray v. Law, 7 U.S.3 Cranch, 179 [2:404]; Bronson v. La Crosse & M. R. R. Co. 67 U. S. 2 Black, 524, 531 [17: 359, 360] and Thompson v. Dean, 74 U. S. 7 Wall. 342 [19: 94], in which last case it is said, p. 345 [95]: "In this case the decree directs the performance of a specific act, and requires that it be done forthwith. The effect of the act when done is to invest the transferees with all the rights of ownership. It changes the property in the stock as absolutely and as completely as could be done by execution on a decree for sale. It looks to no future modification or change of the decree." If a sale had been made under the decree as it stood in Shedd's Case, "the title of the purchaser would not have been overthrown or invalidated, even by a reversal of the decree; and consequently the title of the defendants to the lands would have been extinguished, and their redress upon the reversal, would have been of a different sort from that of a restitution of the land sold." Such was the language of this court, speaking through Mr. Justice Story, in Whiting v. Bank of U. S. 38 U. S., 13 Pet. 6, 15 [10:33, 37], in reference to the effect of a sale under a decree of foreclosure and sale, and there cannot be a doubt of its correctness. It was for this reason the decree in Shedd's Case was held to be final in the sense of a court of equity for the purpose of an appeal.

But in Parsons v. Robinson, we held there was no decree of sale which could be "carried immediately into execution;" that no order of sale could issue until the court had "given its authority in that behalf;" and that "further judicial action must be had by the court before its ministerial officers could proceed to carry the decree into execution." In this consists the difference between the two cases; in Shedd's Case there was actually a decree of sale; in Parson's Case there was not. So, here, there has been no actual decree of sale; and the motion to dismiss is granted.

HENRY S. GILSON, Plff. in Err.,
TOWN OF DAYTON.

Town bonds, when invalid.

Where the law, under which town bonds in aid of a railroad purport to have been issued, has been declared void, and the bonds are sought to be supported by another law which requires that the application for the town meeting shall be made by twenty voters and taxpayers, and the record does not show that any of those who signed the application for the meeting at which the vote was taken were taxpayers, a recovery cannot be had upon them.

Submitted Oct. 11, 1887. Decided Oct. 24, 1887.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Northern District of Illinois. Affirmed.

Action against the Town of Dayton on town bonds purporting to be issued by it under the Act of February 18, 1857, which Act has been declared void by reason of its not appearing by the legislative journal to have been passed as required by the Constitution. Plaintiff claimed to be a bona fide holder and to recover under the Act of March 6, 1867, which was in force on May 1, 1869, when the bonds were issued. A copy of the bond is set forth in the declaration containing the recital that it was issued under the Act of 1857. The Town demurred to the declaration. The circuit court in which the action was commenced sustained the demurrer and dismissed the action and the plaintiff Gilson appealed to this court.

The Act of March 6, 1867, gave ample power for the vote and issue of the bonds in question.

Knox County v. Aspinwall, 62 U. S. 21 How. 539 (16: 208); Gelpcke v. Dubuque, 68 U. S. 1 Wall. 203 (17:524); Marshall County v. Schenck, 72 U. S. 5 Wall. 784 (18:559); Lexington v. Butler, 81 U. S. 14 Wall. 282 (20:809).

Municipal bonds held by bona fide purchasers bought before maturity, in good faith, for a valuable consideration, and without notice of any defense, have been held valid, where there appeared adequate legislative authority therefor; and where a vote of the people is recited on the face of the bonds, the municipality is estopped from denying the election.

Warren County v. Marcy, 97 U. S. 104 (24:980); Douglas County v. Bolles, 94 U. S. 104 (24:46); Empire Twp. v. Darlington, 101 U. S. 87 (25:878); Marcy v. Oswego, 92 U. S. 638 (23:748); Coloma v. Eaves, 92 U. S. 484 (23:579).

The bonds reciting on their face a void Act, that of February 18, 1857, as legislative authority, when the valid Act of March 6, 1867, giving ample power to issue the bonds, was in force, must be chargeable to the officers of the Town, and no loss thereby should fall upon a bona fide holder of bonds purchased without notice and for a valuable consideration before maturity.

Marcy v. Oswego, and Coloma v. Eaves, supra.

If there was any legislative power in existence, at the time the bonds were issued, for the vote and the issue of the bonds in question, an innocent purchaser had a right to rely upon it, and the bonds are valid.

Maher v. Chicago, 38 Ill. 273; Johnson County v. January, 94 U. S. 204 (24:111).

Where the wrong Act is recited, the recital of it will be rejected, and the bonds held valid under an existing Act granting the power to issue them.

Anderson County v. Beal, 113 U. S. 227 (28:966); Johnson County v. January, supra; Burr v. Chariton County, 2 McCrary, 603.

A municipal bond is valid as negotiable paper under the law merchant, when any power existed for its issue, even though not disclosed upon its face.

1 Dill. Mun. Corp. 541; Ackley School Dist. v. Hall, 113 U. S. 139 (28:956); Moran v. Miami County, 67 U. S. 2 Black, 722 (17:342); Mercer County v. Hacket, 68 U. S. 1 Wall. 83 (17:548); White v. Vermont & M. R. R. 62 U. S. 21 How. 576 (16:222); Thompson v. Lee County, 70 U. S. 3 Wall. 331 (18:178); Marion County v. Clark, 94 U. S. 278 (24:59); Cromwell v. Sac County, 96 U. S. 51 (24:681).

Questions of form merely, or irregularity, or fraud, or misconduct on the part of the agents of the Town cannot be considered.

East Lincoln v. Davenport, 94 U. S. 801 (24:322); Rock Creek v. Strong, 96 U. S. 271 (24:815).

The bonds in this suit appearing regular on their face in every particular, the doctrine of equitable estoppel is applicable.

Johnson County v. January, 94 U. S. 202 (24:110); Royal British Bank v. Turquand, 6 El. & Bl. 327; Wilmarth v. Crawford 10 Wend. 343; Alleghany City v. McClurkan, 14 Pa. 83.

Mr. G. S. Eldredge, for defendant in error:

This case seems to be a wholly groundless attempt to procure the reconsideration of a question which has been heard and conclusively settled by the Supreme Court of Illinois in the cases of Ryan v. Lynch, 68 Ill. 160, and Miller v. Goodwin, 70 Ill. 659, and by this court in South Ottawa v. Perkins, 94 U. S. 260 (24:154), and Amoskeag Nat. Bank v. Ottawa, 105 U. S. 667 (26:1204).

The bonds sued upon were issued under the Act of February 18, 1857, and in pursuance of no other authority whatever. The resort to the Act of 1867 is a mere subterfuge, and can avail nothing.

The judgment in this case is affirmed on the authority of Crow v. Oxford, 119 U. S. 215 [30: 388]. See also Post v. Supervisors, 105 U. S. 667, 691 [26:1204, 1213]. It appears on the face of the bonds sued for that the subscription was made under and by virtue of the Act of February 18, 1857, and that the vote of the Town was taken at a special town meeting called upon the "application in writing of fifty legal voters of said Town," which is in accordance with the provisions of that Act. The Act of March 6, 1867, which the plaintiff now claims is sufficient to support the bonds, requires that the application for the town meeting shall be made by "twenty voters and taxpayers." The record does not show that any of those who signed the application for the meeting at which the vote was taken were taxpayers. It thus appears from the bonds themselves not only that they were issued under the Act of 1857, but that they were not issued under that of 1867.

POTOMAC STEAMBOAT COMPANY,

Claimant of the Steamer EXCELSIOR,

BAKER SALVAGE COMPANY.

(See S. C. "The Excelsior," Reporter's ed. 40-51.)

Salvage claim—when not barred—agreement to arbitrate—excessive recovery.

1. To bar a meritorious claim for salvage by a special contract, it is necessary to plead and prove a binding contract to be paid at all events for the work, labor and service in attempting to save the property whether the same should be lost or saved.

2. A binding contract of that character is not proved by a loose conversation between the respective parties after the salvage service had been partly rendered.

3. An agreement to submit to arbitration the amount to be received for the salvage service in case the parties could not agree is no bar to an action for salvage brought in the ordinary way in the admiralty division. If effect could have been given to it at all, it would be only by bringing an action upon it for not submitting to arbitration.

4. Since the Act of 1875, in cases of salvage, as in other admiralty cases, this court should not alter the decree for the reason that the amount awarded appears to be too large, unless the excess is so great that upon any reasonable view of the facts found the award cannot be justified by the rules of law applicable to the case.

Submitted Oct. 11, 1887. Decided Oct. 24, 1887.

The facts of the case are fully stated in the opinion.

Mr. Theodore S. Garnett, Jr., for appellant:

The Independence, 2 Curt. C. C. 355.

The H. B. Foster, Abb. Adm. 223.

Mr. W. H. C. Ellis, for appellee:

The facts certified by the circuit court in this case constitute a salvage service.

The Connemara, 108 U. S. 352 (27:751).

Nothing short of a contract to pay a given sum for the service to be rendered, or a binding engagement to pay at all events, whether successful or unsuccessful, will operate as a bar to a meritorious claim for salvage. The evidence must show a definite and explicit bargain.

The Camanche, 75 U. S. 8 Wall. 477 (19:405); The Independence, 2 Curt. C.C. 350; The Salacia, 2 Hagg. Adm. 262.

If the libelants refused to refer the amount of compensation to arbitration as agreed, that is no bar to a suit for salvage.

Coffin v. The John Shaw, 1 Cliff. 230.

Mr. Justice Blatchford delivered the opinion of the court.

This is a libel in rem, in admiralty, in a cause of salvage, filed by the Baker Salvage Company, a corporation of Virginia, against the steamer Excelsior and her cargo, in the District Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Virginia. That court awarded to the libelant, by a decree made on the 21st of of February, 1884, the sum of $ 5,600, as salvage, being 3½ per cent on $160,000, the value of The Excelsior having been found at $150,000, and the value of her cargo at $10,000. 19 Fed. Rep. 436. The claimant appealed to the circuit court, which, on the 19th of May, 1884, affirmed the decree of the district court, with interest on the $5,600 from the date of the decree of the district court, until paid, at the rate of 6 per cent per annum, and the costs of suit.

The circuit court found the following facts and conclusions of law:

"On the afternoon of the fourth of December, 1882, at five o'clock, the steamer Excelsior, Captain T. E. Baldwin, of the Potomac Steamboat Company, plying between Norfolk, Va., and Washington, D. C., touching at Old Point, Fortress Monroe, left her dock at Norfolk, steamed down the Elizabeth River and into Hampton Roads, heading the usual course to make a landing at Old Point wharf. She had on board a competent crew and an average number of passengers, the agreed value of the steamer being $150,000 and of her cargo $10,000.

"As The Excelsior was heading the aforesaid course in Hampton Roads, at or near six P. M., the United States steam tug Fortune came into collision with her, by an accident. The Fortune struck The Excelsior, which is of wood, on the starboard bow, making a hole in her hull at least 8 by 10 feet; and it being apparent that The Excelsior must otherwise sink in deep water, from the quantity she was making in her hull through the hole in her bow, she was promptly headed for the shore, going ashore on the south side of Hampton Bar, at about its middle point, about two miles from Old Point wharf, three or four miles from Sewell's Point, between half a mile and a mile from the Soldiers' Home shore, the nearest shore, and within a hundred yards of the channel, where she sank, full of water, with a hole extending from her hurricane deck far down under water, lying almost head on to the shore, in water ranging in depth from six to seven feet at her bow to from ten to twelve feet at her stern.

" 'December 4, 1882.

" 'Send assistance, with steam pumps, to Excelsior, on Hampton Bar. Get here by low water.'

" 'Dec. 4, 1882.

" 'Del'y guaranteed. Bring steamer Resolute, a diver, with appliances.'

"The first of these telegrams was received at the telegraph office, in Norfolk, at 8.2 P. M., and the other at 9.15 P. M., on the evening of the collision.

"The Baker Salvage Company, through the agency of its superintendent and general manager, Captain E. M. Stoddard, at once, and vigorously, set to work in response to the telegrams, to render the aid asked for; and, at or about ten P. M., a fully equipped expedition, under the command of Capt. Stoddard, left Berkeley, opposite Norfolk, at the intersection of the southern and eastern branches of the Elizabeth River, where the wharves of the Baker Salvage Company are located, for the purpose of relieving The Excelsior. The expedition consisted of the powerful wrecking steamer Resolute, Hobbs, master, with her stationary steam pump, capable of pumping four hundred tons per hour, with the schooner Scud in tow, having on board a portable steam pump capable of pumping one hundred tons per hour, and a full complement of wrecking material and appliances, the whole manned by a crew of ten seamen experienced in wrecking operations, and accompanied by a skilled diver, with diving apparatus. Captain Stoddard making all reasonable haste, and in the exercise of his judgment, did not attempt to go alongside of The Excelsior that night, not knowing her exact position on Hampton Bar, and being unable to identify her lights, but went directly to Old Point wharf, where he arrived about one o'clock on the morning of December 5, when it was flood tide there. Between that hour and daylight he secured the services of a number of laborers at Old Point, whose services he anticipated would be needed to remove the cargo, thus materially advancing the work for which he had come. At daylight on the morning of the 5th of December, Capt. Stoddard, with the expedition above described, went to The Excelsior, and found her lying as above described, submerged to her main deck, with a hole in her bow, and full of water, water standing on her main deck aft at high tide, and about two feet below her guards at low tide.

"The Excelsior's cargo had not been reached by the water, being stored about amidships, which was higher than the stern. Captain Stoddard at once had an interview with Captain Baldwin, in the presence of the purser of The Excelsior. Captain Baldwin asked what it was going to cost to get the ship off and deliver her at the railroad. Stoddard replied: 'I do not know;' to which Baldwin replied: 'This is not a salvage service;' to which Stoddard replied: 'Call it what you please, so I get my pay;' to which Captain Baldwin replied: 'It is no salvage service;' and they both agreed to submit to arbitration the amount to be received for the service by the Baker Salvage Company, in case the two Companies could not agree upon a sum.

"At this point, viz., about seven o'clock on the morning of the 5th, Captain Stoddard began the direct operations upon The Excelsior and her cargo, for their relief. He brought The Scud alongside The Excelsior, for the purpose of removing the steamer's cargo to Old Point wharf, and, placing the diving apparatus aboard The Excelsior, set the diver to work to ascertain minutely the exact extent of the wound that had been sustained by the steamer in the collision; and, while this was going on, he returned to Old Point wharf in The Resolute, and brought off the laborers above mentioned, who had been employed to assist in the removal of cargo, and lumber to be used by the diver in battening up the hole.

"The work of removing the cargo to Old Point wharf was continued throughout the day, until, after three trips of The Scud, in tow of The Resolute, it was successful between 4 and 5 o'clock of the afternoon of the 5th of December, without loss, the work being done under the management and at the risk of the Baker Salvage Company, the second officer of The Excelsior supervising the same, hurrying up the laborers, keeping their time, and seeing that nothing was stolen.

"The diver, who began his operations about seven A. M. of the 5th of December, as aforesaid, worked steadily until the night of that day, battening up the hole with plank and covering the same with canvas. Resuming his work at an early hour the next morning, he completed it by one P. M. of the same day, the 6th.

"On the afternoon of the 5th, after the removal of the cargo to Old Point wharf had been completed, and The Scud anchored for safety inside Hampton Bar, with but one man left aboard of her as a guard, The Resolute came alongside The Excelsior on her starboard or weather side, put out fenders, made fast so as to be in position to use her stationary pump, and began to assist in the work of setting up the portable pump on board of The Excelsior. The work of setting up this portable pump was continued until nine P. M., the pump and all attachments being furnished by the Baker Salvage Company, only the steam for running it being supplied by the donkey engine of The Excelsior, while The Resolute was lying on The Excelsior's starboard side or windward side, as aforesaid. Between 7 and 8 o'clock on December 5 it began to blow a fresh or strong breeze from the east or southeast, so as to induce the master of The Excelsior to request that The Resolute lie alongside of the steamer, for the protection of the lives of those aboard of her, in case her joiner work should be carried away and she should begin to break up. The Resolute thus continued to lie on the starboard or weather side of the steamer, it being impracticable to shift her position to the lee side in such a breeze and with such a sea on; and, while lying thus, she afforded considerable protection to The Excelsior, acting as a breakwater to her, and incurred considerable risk herself. This wind, which produced quite a rough sea, lasted from between 7 and 8 o'clock on the evening of December 5, until about one o'clock on the following morning, during which time a portion of the crew of The Resolute had to be constantly at work putting in new fenders between the steamers as others would be crushed by the chafing, and keeping them in position; to do which it was necessary to go between the two steamers upon their guards, with no little danger to life or limb. Steam was also kept up on The Resolute all night, for immediate use in case of emergency.

"Soon after daylight on the morning of the 6th work was resumed; the diver and gang battening up the hole, the crew of The Resolute, under the superintendence of Captain Stoddard, getting ready the stationary pump on board The Resolute, and completing the work of setting up the portable pump on board The Excelsior that had been begun the previous evening. The latter was completed about nine A. M., of this day, the 6th, as aforesaid, and was set to work to lower the water in the hold of the steamer, and thus assist the diver in his work of covering the planking with canvas, by drawing the canvas in. The stationary pump was ready by 12 M.; and, the diver completing his work of battening soon after that, both pumps were set to work at their full capacity, so that, at or near 2:30 P. M., the hull of The Excelsior had been so far freed from water, that the tug Olive Baker, that had been previously engaged to assist in the work, and had a line attached, hauled the steamer afloat. Captain Stoddard at once started to Norfolk with The Excelsior, having her in tow of the steam tugs Olive Baker and Olive Branch, and the wrecking steamer Victoria J. Peed; while The Resolute kept alongside, pumping every twenty minutes, to keep the hull free from water. Great care was exercised in towing the steamer across Hampton Roads and up the river to Norfolk, as the hole in her bow was only covered with pine boards, one inch thick, and one thickness of No. 1 canvas, which might be knocked off by any hard substance floating in the water, that might come in contact with it. The work was successfully accomplished, however, and by five P. M., of December 5, 1882, The Excelsior had been safely docked in Norfolk.

"The salvage service was thus successfully completed within less than 45 hours after the aid of the salvors had been invoked, and that without a single error of omission or commission on their part. The work was done with an energy, skill, fidelity, and courage that admit of no question. The officers and crew of The Excelsior rendered all the aid in their power to the salvors."

"The point at which The Excelsior was lying is on the south side of Hampton Bar, about midway between its northeastern and southeastern extremities, and on the northern border of Hampton Roads; the locality an exposed one, vessels ashore there being exposed to all winds from the east round to the southwest, and winds from the east come right in from the Atlantic Ocean, through the Capes on to the bar, with no breakwater, except that furnished by the rip-raps and the small shoals about it. The weather, as it actually existed during the greater portion of the time of the salvage service was moderate, with light winds and no very heavy sea; but, on the evening of the 5th of December, a strong breeze set in from the east or southeast, between seven and eight o'clock, which lasted until one o'clock on the morning of the 6th, causing the water to be rough, and creating considerable apprehension for the safety of The Excelsior. This constantly threatened danger was increased by the fact that The Excelsior is an expensively furnished bay and river steamer, standing very high out of the water, and composed almost entirely, above her main deck, of light joiner work, liable to be carried away by winds and waves, with guards from two to three feet wide at her stern to ten or twelve feet wide at her wheel houses, under which, in her then present position, the waves struck with great force, since she could not rise with them, liable to tear up her guards, and to cause her slender joiner work to give way and the steamer to break up. These things rendered dispatch necessary.

"The Baker Salvage Company, the libelant, is a body politic and corporate, with its principal office located at Norfolk, in the State of of Virginia. Its business is that of wrecker and salvor, in which it is extensively engaged, its operations being conducted in the Atlantic Ocean and Gulf of Mexico, and along the coasts of those waters and the waters tributary thereto, wherever its services may be needed. The capital embarked in the said business is about $100,000, and it keeps constantly on hand, and in readiness for immediate use in its business, a number of powerful steamers and sailing vessels, proper for wrecking services, with a full equipment of the best and most improved wrecking apparatus and gear, such as steam pumps and connections, diving apparatus and gear, hoisting engines, anchors, chains, and cables of unusual size, falls, with a competent force of seamen, navigators, and divers, who have attained skill from their experience in wrecking operations. This immense equipment is kept up at an average expense of $5,000 per month during the busy months—say, eight months in the year—and at an average of $2,500 during the balance of the year, and that, exclusive of interest on the large amount of capital invested, being the mere running expenses.

"In addition to the wrecking steamers Resolute and Victoria J. Peed, and the schooner Scud, with all the wrecking appliances and apparatus, its own property, which the Baker Salvage Company had employed in this service, it had also chartered, and used to assist in the work, the steam tugs Olive Branch, Olive Baker, and Nettie. The Baker Salvage Company had exposed to dangers incident to this salvage service at least $50,000 worth of its valuable property, which, in the case of destruction, must have been a total loss, since insurance companies will only insure property so engaged at exorbitant rates, if at all. And the court finds that the libelant is entitled, for its salvage service in this cause, to the sum of $5,600, with interest thereon from the 21st day of February, 1884, until paid;" "and the court finds the law to be, that this is a case of salvage;" "that the alleged contract which the claimant attempts to set up is no bar to a meritorious claim for salvage, in admiralty; that the libelant, the salvor, is entitled to be rewarded for the salvage service in proportion to the personal risk run by its employés while engaged in this salvage service, to the danger to which its valuable wrecking equipment was exposed while engaged in this service, to the danger from which the large and valuable property of the claimant has been relieved, to the labor expended by the salvors in rendering the salvage services, and the promptness, skill, and energy with which those services were rendered."

The claimant of The Excelsior and her cargo has appealed to this court, and assigns for error; (1) that the circuit court, in its finding of facts, has ascertained and stated as proved, an agreement between the libelant and the claimant for a quantum meruit for the work and labor done by the libelant, and ought not to have decreed salvage therefor; (2) that the award is excessive in amount.

1. It is contended, on the facts found, that the question of salvage was fairly raised and settled between the parties before any work was done on the vessel; that what passed amounted to an announcement by Captain Stoddard, the master of the libelant's wrecking steamer, that he must be paid for his services at all events; that this proposal was assented to by the master of The Excelsior; that the work proceeded under that arrangement; and that, therefore, there could be no claim for salvage.

It is very clear that the services rendered by the libelant to The Excelsior constituted a salvage service of a meritorious character. The telegrams sent to the libelant, by virtue of which it entered upon the service, summoned it as a salvor; and the services detailed in the finding of facts constituted salvage services. No agreement was made for a fixed sum to be paid, nor any binding engagement to pay at all events, although there was an agreement to submit to arbitration the amount to be received by the libelant for the service, in case the two companies could not agree upon a sum. It was, however, held by this court, in the case of The Camanche, 75 U. S. 8 Wall. 448, 477, [19:397, 405,] that "nothing short of a contract to pay a given sum for the services to be rendered, or a binding engagement to pay at all events, whether successful or unsuccessful in the enterprise, will operate as a bar to a meritorious claim for salvage."

Nor was there in this case any agreement for a quantum meruit for the work and labor to be done by the libelant. In the case of The Independence, 2 Curt. C. C. 350, 357, the proper rule on the subject was laid down by Mr. Justice Curtis, in these words: "To bar a claim for salvage, where property in distress on the sea has been saved, it is necessary to plead and prove a binding contract to be paid at all events for the work, labor, and service, in attempting to save the property, whether the same should be lost or saved." A binding contract of that character is not proved by such a conversation as took place between the respective parties in the present case. In The Salacia, 2 Hagg. Adm. 262, 265, it was shown that the master of the salvor vessel declared at first "that he should not demand any salvage, but that his crew would not work unless paid for their labor, and that they declined taking a dollar a day, but would take two." As to this, Sir Christopher Robinson said: "It is probable that some such conversation may have passed at the beginning of this service, but it might not be known what would be the extent of it; and the court is not in the habit of considering such loose conversations as conclusive of the merits of any case, when brought regularly before it." In the present case, there was no assent by Captain Stoddard to the statement of Captain Baldwin that the service was not a salvage service, and the assertion by Captain Stoddard that the name of the service was immaterial, so long as he should get his pay, was fairly a statement that he should insist on his pay for the services according to their actual character.

The answer sets up an agreement between the masters of the respective vessels, after The Resolute had arrived at the place where The Excelsior was, that no salvage would be claimed by the libelant. Not only is it not found by the circuit court that any such agreement was made, but, on the facts found, the question was left open as to whether the services were to be paid for as salvage services, in case of success. Moreover, at the time of the conversation between the masters, the salvage service had been partly rendered, because the expedition had been fitted out, and The Resolute and her accompanying schooner, and the steam pumps and other appliances, and the diver, had been taken to where The Excelsior was, in compliance with the summons of her master.

Nor can the agreement for arbitration affect the question of a salvage service. In the case of The Raisby, 10 P. D. 114, there was an agreement to tow a ship in distress, "the matter of compensation to be left to arbitrators at home, to be appointed by the respective owners." As to this Sir James Hannen said: "This, however, was valueless as an agreement. It could not have been pleaded as any answer to an action for salvage brought in the ordinary way in the Admiralty Division, and if effect could have been given to it at all, it would only have been by bringing an action upon it for not submitting to arbitration."

2. As to the amount awarded, the case is not one where, as a question of law, this court can say that the allowance was excessive. On the contrary, it seems to have been reasonable and fair, at least as respects the claimant of The Excelsior and her cargo.

In the recent case in this court of The Connemara, 108 U. S. 352 [27:751], the question involved was so fully considered that it is only necessary to refer to that case, as establishing the principle, that, "since the Act of 1875, in cases of salvage, as in other admiralty cases, this court may revise the decree appealed from for matter of law, but for matter of law only; and should not alter the decree for the reason that the amount awarded appears to be too large, unless the excess is so great that, upon any reasonable view of the facts found, the award cannot be justified by the rules of law applicable to the case." See, also, The Tornado, 109 U. S. 110 [27:874], and The Hesper, 122 U. S. 256 [30:1175].

The decree of the Circuit Court is affirmed.

Motion for writ of error to state court—practice when heard by full bench.

1. This court permits a motion to be made in open court, at the suggestion of the justice to whom the application was first presented, for the allowance of a writ of error to a state court, the case being urgent and important.

2. In such case the proper practice is to hear counsel in support of the motion both on the point whether any federal questions were made and decided in the state court, and upon the character of those questions.

Decided Oct. 24, 1887.

MOTION for the allowance of a writ of error to the Supreme Court of the State of Illinois.

Following the precedent in Twitchell v. Commonwealth, 74 U. S. 7 Wall. 321 [19:223], we have permitted this motion to be made in open court, at the suggestion of Mr. Justice Harlan to whom the application was first presented, on account of the urgency of the case and its importance. But, as was said in that case, "Writs of error to the state courts have never been allowed as of right," that is to say, as of course, and it is the duty of him to whom an application for such a writ is made to ascertain, from an examination of the record of the state court, "whether any question, cognizable here on appeal, was made and decided in the proper court of the State, and whether the case on the face of the record will justify the allowance of the writ."

Deeming that the proper practice, we will hear counsel on Thursday next, in support of this motion, not only upon the point whether any federal questions were actually made and decided in the Supreme Court of the State, but also upon the character of those questions, so that we may determine whether they are such as to make it proper for us to bring the case here for review.

We have caused the Attorney-General of Illinois to be informed that the motion will be heard at the time stated.

Writ of error to state court—when allowed—constitutional amendments—challenges to jurors—construction of state statute—impartial juror—opinions based upon newspaper statements—accused, as a witness—unlawful search—objection, when to be raised—record controls.

1. When application is made to this court, on the suggestion of one of its number to whom a similar application had been previously addressed, for the allowance of a writ of error to the highest court of a State under section 709 of the Revised Statutes, it is the duty of this court to ascertain whether any question reviewable here was made and decided in the court below and whether it is of a character to justify bringing it here for re-examination.

2. The writ ought not to be allowed, if it appears from the face of the record that the decision of the federal question which is complained of was so plainly right as not to require argument, and especially if it is in accordance with the judgment of this court in similar cases.

*For reports of this case below see 122 Ill., also 10 West. Rep. 701, 3 Ill. L. ed. 87.

1. The first ten articles of amendment of the Constitution of the United States were not intended to limit the powers of the state governments in respect to their own people, but to operate on the National Government alone.

2. On an application to this court for a writ of error to a state court, on the ground that a statute of a State as construed by the state court deprived the petitioners of a trial by an impartial jury, this court will only consider rulings on the challenges to the jurors who actually sat at the trial. When a challenge to a juror for bias is disallowed and the juror is peremptorily challenged and excused and an impartial juror is obtained in his place, the constitutional right of the accused is maintained.

3. Where a statute of the State provided that "In the trial of a criminal cause, the fact that a person called as a juror has formed an opinion or impression—based upon rumor or upon newspaper statements, about the truth of which he has expressed no opinion—shall not disqualify him to serve as a juror in such case, if he shall upon oath state that he believes he can fairly and impartially render a verdict therein in accordance with the law and evidence, and the court shall be satisfied of the truth of such statement;" and, at the trial, the state court construed the statute to mean that, "Although the person called as a juryman may have formed an opinion based upon rumor or upon newspaper statements, but has expressed no opinion as to the truth of the newspaper statement, he is still qualified as a juror if he states that he can fairly and impartially render a verdict in accordance with the law and the evidence and the court shall be satisfied of the truth of such statement;" held, that the statute, as construed by the trial court, is not repugnant to section 9 of article 2 of the Constitution of the State, which guarantees to the accused party in every criminal prosecution a speedy trial by an impartial jury.

4. The finding of the trial court upon the issue of whether a juror is impartial ought not to be set aside by the reviewing court unless the error is manifest. Where the challenge is on the ground that the juror had formed an opinion, it must be made clearly to appear that, upon the evidence, the court ought to have found that he had formed such an opinion that he could not in law be deemed impartial.

5. Where it appeared upon the trial that some of the jurors had formed an opinion based upon newspaper statements about the truth of which they had expressed no opinion, and they stated upon oath that they could determine the case upon the proof presented, regardless of such opinion, held, under the circumstances and facts of this case, the action of the court below in permitting such jurors to sit did not amount in law to a denial by the State of a trial by an impartial jury to one who is accused of crime.

6. A party accused of crime who is a witness in his own behalf is bound to submit to a cross examination; and whether such cross examination must be confined to matters pertinent to the testimony in chief or may be extended to the matters in issue, is a question of state law as administered in the courts of the State, and not of federal law.

7. An objection to the use in evidence of a letter on the ground that it was obtained from the defendant by an unlawful search and seizure, which was not made on the trial in the court below, cannot be considered here. To give to this court jurisdiction under section 709 of the Revised Statutes because of the denial by a state court of any right or immunity claimed under the Constitution, it must appear on the record that such right or immunity was specially set up or claimed at the proper time and in the proper way.

8. The objection that defendants, who are foreign born, were denied by the trial court rights guaranteed by treaty, cannot be raised in this court for the first time.

9. The objection that the defendants were not actually present in the state court when sentence was pronounced cannot be made if the record shows that they were present. If this is not in accordance with the fact, the record must be corrected below, not here.

Argued Oct. 21, 27, 28, 1887. Decided Nov. 2, 1887.

APPLICATION for the allowance of a writ of error to the Supreme Court of the State of Illinois. Dismissed.

Petitioners, jointly indicted, tried and convicted of murder in the Criminal Court of Cook County, Illinois, took the case by writ of error to the Supreme Court of that State, where the judgment was affirmed, and the petitioners sentenced to be executed on the 11th of November, 1887.

By section 709 of the United States Revised Statutes, the Supreme Court of the United States has jurisdiction to re-examine "a final judgment in any suit in the highest court of a State, where is drawn in question the validity of a statute of, or any authority exercised under, a State, on the ground of their being repugnant to the Constitution of the United States, and the decision is in favor of their validity; or where any title, right, privilege or immunity is claimed under the Constitution (of the United States), and the decision is against the title, right, privilege or immunity specially set up or claimed, by either party, under such Constitution."

Petitioners allege the following federal questions to be involved and presented in the case; namely:

First. Petitioners challenged the validity of the Statute of Illinois, under and pursuant to which the trial jury was selected and impaneled, on the ground of repugnancy to the Constitution of the United States, and the state court sustained the validity of the statute.

Second. Petitioners asserted and claimed, under the Constitution of the United States, the right, privilege and immunity of trial by an impartial jury, and the decision of the state court was against the right, privilege and immunity so asserted and claimed.

Third. The State of Illinois made, and the state court enforced against petitioners, a law (the aforesaid statute) whereby the privileges and immunities of petitioners as citizens of the United States were abridged, contrary to the Fourteenth Amendment of the Federal Constitution.

Fourth. Upon their trial for a capital offense, petitioners were compelled by the state court to be witnesses against themselves, contrary to the provisions of the Constitution of the United States, which declare that "No person shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself," and that "no person shall be deprived of life or liberty without due process of law."

Fifth. That by the action of the state court in said trial, petitioners were denied the equal protection of the laws, contrary to the guaranty of the said Fourteenth Amendment of the Federal Constitution.

The further facts are sufficiently stated in the opinion.

Messrs. M. Salomon, Roger A. Pryor, J. Randolph Tucker and B. F. Butler, for petitioners:

If, upon the record, it be reasonably doubtful whether a federal question is involved, the writ of error will be allowed.

Callan v. May, 67 U. S. 2 Black, 543 (17:282).

If a federal question be sufficiently apparent, the writ will be allowed without consideration of the question itself.

Wall. 783 (19:731); Furman v. Nichol, 75 U. S. 8 Wall. 56 (19:375); Bohanan v. Nebraska, 118 U. S. 231 (30:71); Pennywit v. Eaton, 82 U. S. 15 Wall. 380 (21:72); Millingar v. Hartupee, 73 U. S. 6 Wall. 258, 260 (18:829); Hall v. Jordan, 82 U. S. 15 Wall. 393, 395 (21:72); Arrowsmith v. Harmoning, 118 U. S. 195 (30:243); Church v. Kelsey, 121 U. S. 282 (30:960); Baltimore & O. R. R. Co. v. Maryland, 87 U. S. 20 Wall.643 (22:446); Hayes v. Missouri, 120 U. S. 68 (30:578); Foster v. Kansas, 112 U. S. 206 (28:697).

The particular provision of the Federal Constitution, under which the right, privilege or immunity is claimed, or to which the state law is repugnant, need not be indicated upon the record; but it suffices to make a general claim of protection under the Constitution of the United States.

Bridge Propre. v. Hoboken Co. 68 U. S. 1 Wall. 116 (17:571); Furman v. Nichol, supra; Murray v. Charleston, 96 U. S. 432 (24:760); Dugger v. Bocock, 104 U. S. 603 (26:849); Miller v. Nicholls, 17 U. S. 4 Wheat. 311 (4:578).

It is sufficient if it appears by clear and necessary intendment that the question must have been raised.

Crowell v. Randell, 35 U. S. 10 Pet. 368 (9:458); Phœnix Ins. Co. v. The Treasurer, 78 U. S. 11 Wall. 209 (20:112); Pennywit v. Eaton, supra; Craig v. Missouri, 29 U. S. 4 Pet. 410 (7:903); Minnesota v. Batchelder, 68 U. S. 1 Wall. 109 (17:551).

The last formal exposition by this court of the 25th section of the Act of 1789 is in Furman v. Nichol, supra.

But the jurisdiction of this court to re-examine the judgments of the highest state court is regulated now, not by the Act of 1789, but by the Act of 1867, section 2.

Murdock v. Memphis, 87 U. S. 20 Wall. 590 (22:429).

The requirement in the Act of 1789 that the federal question must appear on the face of the record, is omitted from the Act of 1867.

R. S. § 709; Gross v. Mortgage Co. 108 U. S. 484 (27:797); Tennessee v. Davis, 100 U. S. 258 (25:648).

It is not necessary to the jurisdiction of the United States Supreme Court, that the highest state court in terms passed upon petitioners' claim, if it has been withheld or denied by the judgment below.

Chicago L. Ins. Co. v. Needles, 113 U. S. 579 (28:1086); Brown v. Colorado, 106 U. S. 95-97 (27:132, 133); Arrowsmith v. Harmoning, supra; Murdock v. Memphis, 87 U. S. 20 Wall. 634 (22:443); Walker v. Sauvinet, 92 U. S. 92 (23:679).

The federal question may be raised and presented by the rulings of the court on offers of evidence (Hall v. Jordan, supra); or by the reasons given by the court for its rulings (Boston Beer Co. v. Mass. 97 U. S. 31 (24:989); or by implication on the decision of a demurrer (Williams v. Bruffy, 96 U. S. 182 (24:716); Ford v. Surget, 97 U. S. 602 (24:1020); Armstrong v. The Treasurer, 41 U. S. 16 Pet. 281 (10:965).

So, for the existence and decision of a federal question we may look to the opinion of the state court, especially of Illinois.

Gross v. Mortgage Co. 108 U. S. 477, 486 (27:795, 798); Philadelphia F. Asso. v. People, 119 U. S. 110, 116 (30:342); Murdock v. Memphis, supra.

And the decision of the federal question need not be the principal ground of judgment in the state court.

Baltimore & O. R. R. Co. v. Maryland, 88 U. S. 21 Wall. 457 (22:678); Arrowsmith v. Harmoning, and Bohanan v. Nebraska, supra; Hurtado v. California, 110 U. S. 516 (28:232).

The state courts adjudicated that the Illinois Statute authorized the impaneling of jurors with a preconceived and present opinion as to the guilt of petitioners; and accepting that construction as conclusive, the United States Supreme Court may hold that the Act is unconstitutional and void.

Hall v. DeCuir, 95 U. S. 485 (24:547).

Though the law be fair on its face yet if it is administered with an unequal hand, the denial of equal justice is still within the prohibition of the Constitution.

Yick Wo v. Hopkins, 118 U. S. 366, 373, 374 (30:222, 227).

Its constitutional validity must be determined by its natural and reasonable effect.

Henderson v. Wickham, 92 U. S. 259 (23:543).

Whoever, by virtue of public position under a state government deprives another of life, liberty or property, without due process of law, violates the constitutional inhibition.

Ex parte Va. 100 U. S. 339, 347 (25: 676, 679); Strauder v. West Va. 100 U. S. 303, 310 (25: 664, 666); Virginia v. Rives, 100 U. S. 313, 318 (25:667, 669); Neal v. Delaware, 103 U. S. 370, 397 (26:567, 574); Civil Rights Cases, 109 U. S. 3, 11, 13, 15 (27:836, 839, 840).

In passing the Act of 1867, it was the purpose of Congress to secure to every litigant whose rights depended on any question of federal law, that the question should be decided for him by the highest federal tribunal, if he desired it.

Constitutional provisions for the security of person and property should be liberally construed.

Boyd v. United States, 116 U. S. 617, 635 (29:746, 752).

By a uniform current of decisions, the Supreme Court of Illinois held, under its former Constitutions of 1818 and 1848, that one on trial charged with a criminal offense was entitled to an impartial jury; and that if a proposed juror admitted upon his voir dire that he had a fixed or firm opinion touching the question of the prisoner's guilt,—no matter upon what such opinion was based,—an opinion to remove which evidence would be required, such person was not impartial.

See Smith v. Eames, 3 Scam. 76; Gardner v. People, 3 Scam. 83; Vennum v. Harwood, 1 Gilm. 659; Baxter v. People, 3 Gilm. 368; Neely v. People, 13 Ill. 685; Gray v. People, 26 Ill. 344; Collins v. People, 48 Ill. 146; Chicago & A. R. R. Co. v. Adler, 56 Ill. 344.

By sections 5 and 9 of article 2 of the third Constitution of the State of Illinois, adopted in 1870, it was provided as follows:

"Sec. 5. The right of trial by jury as heretofore enjoyed shall remain inviolate."

"Sec. 9. In all criminal prosecutions the accused shall have the right to * * * a speedy public trial by an impartial jury of the county or district in which the offense is alleged to have been committed."

Under these provisions of said last mentioned Constitution the same ruling was enforced touching the disqualification of a proposed juror by reason of the formation of a fixed opinion as under the prior Constitutions.

Winnesheik Ins. Co. v. Schueller, 60 Ill. 465; Plummer v. People, 74 Ill. 361.

The Supreme Court of Illinois has uniformly accorded to persons accused of crime the protection in the selection of a jury of excluding from the jury, as disqualified by reason of partiality, favor or bias, persons who confessed a prejudice against the class of persons to which the defendants confessedly belonged.

See Winnesheik Ins. Co. v. Schueller, supra; Chicago & A. R. R. Co. v. Buttolf, 66 Ill. 347; Lavin v. People, 69 Ill. 303.

Supplemental brief by Mr. Roger A. Pryor:

The Illinois Statute is not "due process of law" within the meaning of that provision of the Constitution.

Murray v. Hoboken L. & I. Co. 59 U. S. 18 How. 276 (15:372); Davidson v. New Orleans, 96 U. S. 102, 107 (24:618, 620); Hoke v. Henderson, 4 Dev. 15; Wynehamer v. People, 13 N. Y. 395; Taylor v. Porter, 4 Hill, 140; Pomeroy, Const. L. 163; Hager v. Reclamation Dist. No. 108, 111 U. S. 708 (28:572); Bank v. Okely, 17 U. S. 4 Wheat. 244 (4:561); Pennoyer v. Neff, 95 U. S. 714 (24:565); Cooley, Const. Lim. 356; Hurtado v. California, 110 U. S. 527, 528 (28:236); Kennard v. Louisiana, 92 U. S. 481 (23:479).

To be "due process of law," state legislation must be exerted within the limits of those fundamental principles which lie at the base of our civil and political institutions.

Hurtado v. California, 110 U. S. 535 (28:238); Brown v. Commissioners, 50 Miss. 478-487, cited with approval by this court in Hurtado v. California, supra; Rowan v. State, 30 Wis. 139; Hopt v. Utah, 110 U. S. 579 (28: 265); Re Ziebold, 23 Fed. Rep. 791; 4 Bl. Com. 349; Creasy, English Const. 243; Hamilton, Dawson's Federalist, 581.

At the time of the adoption of the Fourteenth Amendment of the Constitution, in every State of the Union, capital offenses were triable only by jury.

Ex parte Bain, 121 U. S. 12 (30:849); Sedgwick, Stat. & Const. L. p. 225, note a. 1 Story, Const. § 165; 2 Story, §§ 1779-1782.

Due process of law implies and requires a trial by an impartial jury.

A jury is generally understood to mean ex vi termini, a jury of twelve men impartially selected, who must unanimously concur in the guilt of the accused. Any law, therefore, dispensing with any of these requisites may be considered unconstitutional.

Paschal, Annotated Const. 210; Work v. State, 2 Ohio St. 296; State v. Cox, 3 Eng. (Ark.) 436; People v. Johnson, 2 Parker, Crim. Cas. 322; People v. Fisher, Id. 402; People v. Toynbee, Id. 562; Cancemi v. People, 18 N. Y. 135; 2 Lead. Crim. Cas. 827, note; Story, Const. § 1779; Ex Parte Milligan, 71 U. S. 4 Wall. 123 (18:296); U. S. v. Reid, 53 U. S. 12 How. 363, 364 (13:1024); Olive v. State, 11 Neb. 23; 1 Co. Lit. 155 a, note (d); 4 Bl. Com. 249; Hayes v. Missouri, 120 U. S. 69, 70 (30:578); Waite, Ch. J., in Reynolds v. U. S. 98 U. S. 155 (25:246); Taney, Ch. J., Whart. Crim. Pr. & Pl. § 625.

If a juror's mind is preoccupied with an opinion upon the case to be tried, that, upon principle, and by all the cases, incapacitates him as a juror.

Cancemi v. People, 16 N. Y. 501, 504, 505.

The Illinois Statute makes competent a juror with a preconceived and present opinion as to the guilt of the accused.

Henderson v. The Mayor, 92 U. S. 259 (23:543); Hall v. De Cuir, 95 U. S. 485 (24:547); 1 Bish. Crim. Proc. § 910; Cooley, J., Stephens v. People, 38 Mich. 742.

The accused had a right to protect themselves as well by challenge for cause as by peremptory challenge.

Hayes v. Missouri, supra.

And it is not within the compass of legislation to change the legal presumptions of innocence.

Wynehamer v. People, 13 N. Y. 447; Cummings v. Missouri, 71 U. S. 4 Wall. 328 (18:364); Pennoyer v. Neff, supra.

An equal right to an impartial jury is placed by the Fourteenth Amendment under the protection of the General Government, and guaranteed by it.

Ex parte Va. 100 U. S. 345 (25:679).

Some of the petitioners were, by the production in evidence of papers and property unlawfully seized and taken, compelled to be witnesses against themselves.

Boyd v. U. S. 116 U. S. 617 (29:746); 2 Hallam, Const. Hist.; 7 Coke, 3d, Inst. 35; 2 Story, Const. § 1788.

The immunity from self-accusing evidence was abridged by the action of the state court in compelling petitioners to be witnesses against themselves. The action of the state judiciary is the action of the State.

Ex parte Va. supra; Strauder v. West Va. 100 U. S. 303-310 (25:664, 666); Virginia v. Rives, Id. 313-318 (25:667, 669); Neal v. Delaware, 103 U. The Nation, through its Congress and its courts, can afford to its citizens at home complete protection against the discriminating legislation of the States which may attempt to invade their privileges and immunities.

The Fourteenth Amendment declares that no State shall deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law.

Hurtado v. California, 110 U. S. 516 (28: 232).

"Due process" means consistency with common-law right. There must be an impartial jury.

Whart. Am. L. § 566

"Due process" means jury trial, made so by Magna Charta.

1 Kent, 612–14; see also Reg. v. Baldry, 2 Den. C. C. 444; Reg. v. Jarvis, 1 L. R. C. C. 96.

So being twice put in jeopardy is against common-law right.

Reg. v. Bird, 2 Den. C. C. 216; Essays, etc., of J. S. Blach. 519.

The Fourteenth Amendment provides that no State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States. Those privileges and immunities have been judicially defined partially in Corfield v. Coryell, 4 Wash. C. C. 371.

Slaughter-House Cases, 83 U. S. 16 Wall. 36 (21:394); Passenger Cases, 48 U. S. 7 How. 283 (12:702); Bartemeyer v. Iowa, 85 U. S. 18 Wall. 129 (21:929); Walker v. Sauvinet, 92 U. S. 90 (23:678).

The fundamental nature of these rights, as common-law rights, may be seen by reference to Tucker's Blachs. App. 305, 3 Story, §§ 1779, 1781–1783. As to searches, self-accusations, etc.:

Hayes v. Missouri, 120 U. S. 70 (30:579), Field, J., on the value of peremptory challenges.

The prisoners were denied "due process of law," because tried by a packed jury.

Spies was illegally examined on matters as to which he did not testify in chief,—he was compelled to answer; and letters were illegally seized by officers of the Government without warrant of law.

Messrs. George Hunt Atty-Gen. of Illinois, and Julius S. Grinnell, in opposition:

The record does not show that any federal question is involved.

Murdock v. Memphis, 87 U. S. 20 Wall. 590, 636 (22:429, 444); Chouteau v. Gibson, 111 U. S. 200 (28:400); Germania Ins. Co. v. Wisconsin, 119 U. S. 473 (30:461).

The prohibitions contained in the first ten amendments to the Constitution are limitations on the powers of the Federal Government, and not upon the States.

Story, Const. §§ 1904, 1947; U. S. v. Cruikshank, 92 U. S. 542 (23:588); Walker v. Sauvinet, 92 U. S. 90 (23:678); Presser v. Illinois, 116 U. S. 267 (29:619).

So far as petitioners rely upon anything contained in those amendments they have no standing in this court. The Fourteenth Amendment is equally foreign to any right, privilege, or immunity here claimed by the petitioners.

Story, Const. § 1947.

"Due process of law" means law of the land.

Story, Const. §§ 1943, 1945; Yick Wo v. Hopkins, 118 U. S. 367 (30:225).

A trial by jury in suits at common law pending in the state courts is not a privilege or immunity of national citizenship, which the States are forbidden by the Fourteenth Amendment of the Constitution of the United States to abridge.

Walker v. Sauvinet, supra.

The last clause of the Amendment, as to the equal protection of the laws, is not violated by any diversity in the jurisdiction of the several courts which the State might establish.

Missouri v. Lewis, 101 U. S. 22 (25:989).

The systems of procedure in them may be different without violating any provision of the Fourteenth Amendment.

Hayes v. Missouri, 120 U. S. 68 (30:578).

The number of peremptory challenges must necessarily depend upon the discretion of the Legislature. The whole matter is under its control.

ple, 32 N. Y. 147, 159; Commonwealth v. Dorsey, 103 Mass. 412, 418.

Legislation which affects alike all persons similarly situated is not within the Amendment.

Barbier v. Connolly, 113 U. S. 32 (28:925); approved in Yick Wo v. Hopkins, supra; Hayes v. Missouri, 120 U. S. 72 (30:580).

The Fourteenth Amendment does not prevent a State from passing such laws to regulate the privileges and immunities of its own citizens as do not abridge their privileges and immunities as citizens of the United States.

Presser v. Illinois, supra.

The privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States are placed under the protection of the Fourteenth Amendment; and are those which arise out of the nature of the National Government or its Constitution or laws and treaties.

Slaughter-House Cases, 83 U. S. 16 Wall. 36 (21:394).

A State cannot be deemed to be guilty of a violation of this constitutional obligation simply because one of its courts, while acting within its jurisdiction, has made an erroneous decision.

Arrowsmith v. Harmoning, 118 U. S. 194 (30:243); Lehigh Water Co. v. Easton, 121 U. S. 388 (30:1059); U. S. v. Cruikshank, 92 U. S. 542 (23:588).

It must appear from the record that a federal question was raised and decided in the state court.

If it does not appear affirmatively that the federal question raised here was raised in the court below and was decided, and that its decision was necessary to the judgment rendered, this court has no jurisdiction in error over the judgment of such state court.

The personnel of the jury which tried petitioners in this case cannot be considered in the present proceeding.

Several States, to wit: Arkansas, Colorado, Michigan, New York, and Nebraska, have passed laws relating to the qualifications of jurors similar to the law of the State of Illinois.

The New York Statute has been passed upon by the highest court of that State in the following cases:

Stokes v. People, 53 N. Y. 171; Thomas v. People, 67 N. Y. 220; Phelps v. People, 72 N. Y. 363; Greenfield v. People, 74 N. Y. 277; Balbo v. People, 80 N. Y. 484; Cox v. People, Id. 512; People v. Otto, 101 N. Y. 690.

Mr. Chief Justice Waite delivered the opinion of the court:

When, as in this case, application is made to us on the suggestion of one of our number, to whom a similar application had been previously addressed, for the allowance of a writ of error to the highest court of a State under Section 709 of the Revised Statutes, it is our duty to ascertain not only whether any question reviewable here was made and decided in the proper court below, but whether it is of a character to justify us in bringing the judgment here for re-examination. In our opinion the writ ought not to be allowed by the court, if it appears from the face of the record that the decision of the federal question which is complained of was so plainly right as not to require argument, and especially if it is in accordance with our own well considered judgments in similar cases. That is in effect what was done in Twitchell v. Commonwealth, 74 U. S. 7 Wall. 321 [19:223], where the writ was refused, because the questions presented by the record were "no longer subjects of discussion here," although if they had been in the opinion of the court "open" it would have been allowed. When, under Section 5 of our Rule 6, a motion to affirm is united with a motion to dismiss for want of jurisdiction, the practice has been to grant the motion to affirm when "the question on which our jurisdiction depends was so manifestly decided right, that the case ought not to be held for further argument." Arrowsmith v. Harmoning, 118 U. S. 194, 195 [30:243]; Church v. Kelsey, 121 U. S. 282 [30:960]. The propriety of adopting a similar rule upon motions in open court for the allowance of a writ of error is apparent, for certainly we would not be justified as a court in sending out a writ to bring up for review a judgment of the highest court of a State, when it is apparent on the face of the record that our duty would be to grant a motion to affirm as soon as it was made in proper form.

In the present case we have had the benefit of argument in support of the application, and while counsel have not deemed it their duty to go fully into the merits of the federal questions they suggest, they have shown us distinctly what the decisions were of which they complain, and how the questions arose. In this way we are able to determine as a court in session whether the errors alleged are such as to justify us in bringing the case here for review.

We proceed, then, to consider what the questions are on which, if it exists at all, our jurisdiction depends. They are thus stated in the opening brief of counsel for petitioners:

"First. Petitioners challenged the validity of the Statute of Illinois, under and pursuant to which the trial jury was selected and impaneled, on the ground of repugnancy to the Constitution of the United States, and the state court sustained the validity of the statute.

"Second. Petitioners asserted and claimed, under the Constitution of the United States, the right, privilege, and immunity of trial by an impartial jury, and the decision of the state court was against the right, privilege, and immunity so asserted and claimed.

"Third. The State of Illinois made, and the state court enforced against petitioners, a law (the aforesaid statute) whereby the privileges and immunities of petitioners, as citizens of the United States, were abridged, contrary to the Fourteenth Amendment of the Federal Constitution.

"Fourth. Upon their trial for a capital offense, petitioners were compelled by the state court to be witnesses against themselves, contrary to the provisions of the Constitution of the United States, which declare that 'no person shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself,' and that 'no person shall be deprived of life or liberty without due process of law.'

"Fifth. That by the action of the state court in said trial petitioners were denied 'the equal protection of the laws,' contrary to the guaranty of the said Fourteenth Amendment of the Federal Constitution."

The particular provisions of the Constitution of the United States on which counsel rely are found in articles IV, V, VI, and XIV of the amendments, as follows:

Art. IV. "The right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures, shall not be violated."

Art. V. "No person * * * shall be compelled, in any criminal case, to be a witness against himself; nor be deprived of life, liberty or property without due process of law."

Art. VI. "In all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial by an impartial jury of the State and district wherein the crime shall have been committed, which district shall have been previously ascertained by law."

Art. XIV. § 1. "No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty or property, without due process of law."

That the first ten articles of amendment were not intended to limit the powers of the state governments in respect to their own people, but to operate on the National Government alone, was decided more than a half century ago, and that decision has been steadily adhered to since. Barron v. Baltimore, 32 U. S. 7 Pet. 243, 247 [8:672, 674]; Livingston v. Moore, Id. 469, 552 [8:751, 781]; Fox v. Ohio, 46 U. S. 5 How. 410, 434 [12:213, 223]; Smith v. Maryland, 59 U. S. 18 How. 71, 76 [15: 269, 271]; Withers v. Buckley, 61 U. S. 20 How. 84, 91 [15:816, 819]; Pervear v. Commonwealth, 72 U. S. 5 Wall. 475, 479 [18:608, 609]; Twitchell v. Commonwealth, 74 U. S. 7 Wall. 321, 325 [19:223, 224]; The Justices v. Murray, 76 U. S. 9 Wall. 274, 278 [19:658, 660]; Edwards v. Elliott, 88 U. S. 21 Wall. 532, 557 [22:487, 492]; Walker v. Sauvinet, 92 U. S. 90 [23:678]; U. S. v. Cruikshank, Id. 542, 552 [23: 588, 591]; Pearson v. Yewdall, 95 U. S. 294, 296 [24:436, 437]; Davidson v. New Orleans, 96 U. S. 97, 101 [24:616, 618]; Kelly v. Pittsburgh, 104 U. S. 79 [26: 658]; Presser v. Illinois, 116 U. S. 252, 265 [29: 615, 619].

It was contended, however, in argument, that, "though originally the first ten amendments were adopted as limitations on federal power, yet in so far as they secure and recognize fundamental rights—common-law rights—of the man, they make them privileges and immunities of the man as a citizen of the United States, and cannot now be abridged by a State under the Fourteenth Amendment. In other words, while the ten amendments as limitations on power only apply to the Federal Government, and not to the States, yet in so far as they declare or recognize rights of persons, these rights are theirs, as citizens of the United States, and the Fourteenth Amendment as to such rights limits state power, as the ten amendments had limited federal power."

It is also contended that the provision of the Fourteenth Amendment which declares that no State shall deprive "any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law" implies that every person charged with crime in a State shall be entitled to a trial by an impartial jury, and shall not be compelled to testify against himself.

The objections are in brief: (1) that a statute of the State as construed by the court deprived the petitioners of a trial by an impartial jury; and, (2) that Spies was compelled to give evidence against himself. Before considering whether the Constitution of the United States has the effect which is claimed, it is proper to inquire whether the federal questions relied on in fact do arise on the face of this record.

The statute to which objection is made was approved March 12, 1874, and has been in force since July 1 of that year. Hurd, R. S. Ill. 1885, p. 752, chap. 78, § 14. It is as follows:

"It shall be sufficient cause of challenge of a petit juror that he lacks any one of the qualifications mentioned in section 2 of this Act; or if he is not one of the regular panel, that he has served as a juror on the trial of a cause in any court of record in the county within one year previous to the time of his being offered as a juror; or, that he is a party to a suit pending for trial in that court at that term. It shall be the duty of the court to discharge from the panel all jurors who do not possess the qualifications provided in this Act, as soon as the fact is discovered: Provided, if a person has served on a jury in a court of record within one year, he shall be exempt from again serving during such year, unless he waives such exemption: Provided further, that it shall not be a cause of challenge that a juror has read in the newspapers an account of the commission of the crime with which the prisoner is charged, if such juror shall state on oath that he believes he can render an impartial verdict according to the law and the evidence: And provided further, that in the trial of any criminal cause, the fact that a person called as a juror has formed an opinion or impression, based upon rumor or upon newspaper statements (about the truth of which he has expressed no opinion), shall not disqualify him to serve as a juror in such case, if he shall upon oath state that he believes he can fairly and impartially render a verdict therein in accordance with the law and the evidence, and the court shall be satisfied of the truth of such statement."

The complaint is that the trial court, acting under this statute and in accordance with its requirements, compelled the petitioners against their will to submit to a trial by a jury that was not impartial, and thus deprived them of one of the fundamental rights which they had as citizens of the United States under the National Constitution, and if the sentence of the court is carried into execution they will be deprived of their lives without due process of law.

In Hopt v. Utah, 120 U. S. 430 [30:708], it was decided by this court that when "a challenge by a defendant in a criminal action to a juror, for bias, actual or implied, is disallowed, and the juror is thereupon peremptorily challenged by the defendant and excused, and an impartial and competent juror is obtained in his place, no injury is done the defendant, if until the jury is completed he has other peremptory challenges which he can use." And so in Hayes v. Missouri, 120 U. S. 71 [30:580], it was said: "The right to challenge is the right to reject, not to select a juror. If from those who remain an impartial jury is obtained, the constitutional right of the accused is maintained." Of the correctness of these rulings we entertain no doubt.

We are, therefore, confined in this case to the rulings on the challenges to the jurors who actually sat at the trial. Of these there were but two—Theodore Denker, the third juror who was sworn, and H. T. Sanford, the last, who was called and sworn after all the peremptory challenges of the defendants had been exhausted.

At the trial the court construed the statute to mean, that, "although a person called as a juryman may have formed an opinion based upon rumor or upon newspaper statements, but has expressed no opinion as to the truth of the newspaper statement, he is still qualified as a juror if he states that he can fairly and impartially render a verdict thereon in accordance with the law and the evidence, and the court shall be satisfied of the truth of such statement. It is not a test question whether the juror will have the opinion which he has formed from newspapers changed by the evidence, but whether his verdict will be based only upon the account which may here be given by witnesses under oath."

Interpreted in this way, the statute is not materially different from that of the Territory of Utah, which we had under consideration in Hopt v. Utah, ubi supra, and to which we then gave effect. As that was a territorial statute, passed by a Territorial Legislature for the government of a Territory over which the United States had exclusive jurisdiction, it came directly within the operation of article VI of the amendments, which guaranteed to Hopt a trial by an impartial jury. Webster v. Reid, 52 U. S. 11 How. 437, 459 [13:761, 770]. No one at that time suggested a doubt of the constitutionality of the statute, and it was regarded, both in the territorial courts and here, as furnishing the proper rule to be observed by a territorial court in impaneling an impartial jury in a criminal case.

A similar statute was enacted in New York, May 3, 1872, Acts of 1872, chap. 475, 9 N. Y. Stat. at L. 2d ed. 873; in Michigan, April 18, 1873, Acts of 1873, 162, art. 117; How. Stat. § 9564; in Nebraska, Compt. Stat. Neb. 1885, p. 833; Crim. Code, § 468; and in Ohio, R. S. Ohio, 1880, § 7278. The constitutionality of the Statute of New York was sustained by the Court of Appeals of that State in Stokes v. People, 53 N. Y. 164, 172, decided June 10, 1873, and that of Ohio, in Cooper v. State, 16 Ohio St. 328. So far as we have been able to discover, no doubt has ever been entertained in Michigan or Nebraska of the constitutionality of the statutes of those States respectively, but they have always been treated by their supreme courts as valid, both under the Constitution of the United States, and under that of the State. Stephens v. People, 38 Mich. 739, 741; Ulrich v. People, 39 Mich. 245; Murphy v. State, 15 Neb. 383.

Indeed, the rule of the Statute of Illinois as it was construed by the trial court is not materially different from that which has been adopted by the courts in many of the States without legislative action. Commonwealth v. Webster, 5 Cush. 295; Holt v. People, 13 Mich. 224; State v. Fox, 1 Dutch. 566; Osiander v. Commonwealth, 3 Leigh, 780; State v. Ellington, 7 Ired. 61; Smith v. Eames, 3 Scam. 81. See also an elaborate note to this last case in 36 Am. Dec. 521; where a very large number of authorities on the subject are cited.

Without pursuing this subject further, it is sufficient to say that we agree entirely with the Supreme Court of Illinois in its opinion in this case that the statute on its face, as construed by the trial court, is not repugnant to section 9 of article 2 of the Constitution of that State, which guarantees to the accused party in every criminal prosecution, "A speedy trial by an impartial jury of the county or district in which the offense is alleged to have been committed." As this is substantially the provision of the Constitution of the United States on which the petitioners now rely, it follows that, even if their position as to the operation and effect of that Constitution is correct, the statute is not open to the objection which is made against it.

We proceed, then, to a consideration of the grounds of the challenge to the jurors Denker and Sanford, to see if in the actual administration of the rule of the statute by the court, the rights of the defendants under the Constitution of the United States were in any way impaired or violated.

Denker was examined by the counsel for the defendants when he was called as a juror, and, after stating his name and place of residence, proceeded as follows:

"Q. You heard of this Haymarket meeting, I suppose? A. Yes.

"Q. Have you formed an opinion upon the question of the defendants' guilt or innocence upon the charge of murder, or any of them? A. I have.

"Q. Have you expressed that opinion? A. Yes.

"Q. You still entertain it? A. Yes.

"Q. You believe what you read and what you heard? A. I believe it; yes.

"Q. Is that opinion such as to prevent you from rendering an impartial verdict in the case, sitting as a juror, under the testimony and the law? A. I think it is."

At this stage of the examination he was "challenged for cause" for the defendants; but before any decision was made thereon the following occurred:

"Mr. Grinnell (for the State). If you were taken and sworn as a juror in the case, can't you determine the innocence or the guilt of the defendants upon the proof that is presented to you here in court, regardless of your having any prejudice or opinion? A. I think I could.

"Q. You could determine their guilt or innocence upon the proof presented to you here in court, regardless of your prejudice and regardless of your opinion, and regardless of what you have read? A. Yes.

"The Court: Do [Can] you fairly and impartially try the case and render an impartial verdict upon the evidence as it may be presented here and the instructions of the court. A. Yes; I think I could."

The court thereupon overruled the challenge, but before the juror was accepted and sworn he was further examined by counsel for the defendants, as follows:

"Mr. Foster: I was going to ask you something about the opinion that you have formed from reading the papers and from conversation. I believe you answered me before that you had formed an opinion from reading and hearing conversation. That is correct, is it? A. Yes; but I don't believe everything I read in the newspapers.

"Q. No; but you believe enough to form an opinion? A. Yes; I formed an opinion.

"Q. Was that opinion principally from what you read in the papers or was it from what you heard on the street? A. From what I read entirely.

"Q. Then you did believe enough of what you read to form an opinion upon the question of the guilt or innocence of these men or some of them? A. Yes.

"Q. And I believe you said you also expressed your opinion which you have formed to others with whom you conversed? A. Yes; I have expressed that opinion.

"Q. During the expression of this opinion I will ask you whether you stated in substance to these persons or any of them that you believed enough of what you had read to form the opinion which you had?

"The Court: Did you in any conversation that you had say anything as to whether you believed or not the account which was in the newspapers which you read? A. No, sir; I never expressed an opinion in regard to whether the newspapers were correct or not.

"Q. You never discussed that matter at all? A. No, sir."

Then, after some inquiries as to his business, age, and residence, the examination by the counsel for the defendant proceeded:

"Q. Are you acquainted with any members of the police force of the City of Chicago that were present at the Haymarket meeting on the occasion referred to? A. No, sir.

"Q. Have you ever had any conversation with any one that undertook to detail the facts as they occurred at the Haymarket Square, or who claimed they had been there? A. No, sir.

"Q. Is your opinion entirely made up of what you have read distinguished from what you have heard? A. Entirely from what I have read in the newspapers.

"Q. Have you had much conversation with others in regard to it at or about your place of business or elsewhere? A. We have conversed about it a number of times there in the house.

"Q. There is where you have expressed, I presume, the opinion which you have formed? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Do you know anything about socialism, anarchism, or communism? A. No, sir; I do not.

"Q. Have you any prejudice against this class of persons? A. I think I am a little prejudiced against socialism. I don't know that I am against anarchism. In fact, I don't really understand what they are. I do not know what their principles are at all.

"Q. I understand you to say that notwithstanding the opinion you formed at the time you read the newspaper that you now are conscious of the fact that you can try this case and settle it upon the testimony introduced here? A. Yes, I think I could.

"Q. And not be controlled or governed by any impression that you might have had heretofore? A. Yes, sir.

"And the law, as given you by the court, governing it? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. In the conversations that you have had there at the store, you say you have expressed the opinion which you have formed before? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Is that of frequent occurrence—that you have expressed the opinion you have formed? A. Well, I think I have expressed it pretty freely.

"Q. As to the number of times—as to whether it was frequent or not? A. O no; we did not bring the matter up in conversation very often, but when we did we generally expressed our opinion in regard to the matter.

"Q. Your mind was made up from what you read, and you had no hesitancy in saying it—speaking it out? A. I don't think I hesitated.

"Q. Would you feel yourself any way governed or bound in listening to the testimony and determining it upon the prejudgment of the case you had expressed to others before? A. Well, that is a pretty hard question to answer.

"Q. I will ask you whether acting as a juror here you would feel in any way bound or governed by the judgment that you had expressed on the same question to others before you were taken as a juryman; do you understand that? A. I don't think I would.

"Q. That is, you have now made up your mind, or at least you have formed an opinion; you have expressed that freely to others. Now, the question is whether when you listen to the testimony you will have in your mind the expression which you have given to others and have to guard against that and be controlled by it in any way. A. No, sir; I don't think I would. I think I could try the case from the testimony regardless of this.

"Q. I understand you to say that you believe that you can entirely lay to one side the opinion which you have formed; it would require no circumstances or evidence to overcome it if you were accepted as a juryman? A. I think I could lay aside that opinion I have formed.

"Q. You believe that you could? A. Yes."

Here the examination of the juror by the counsel for the defendant, so far as it seems to be important to the present inquiry, was closed.

Then on examination by the attorney for the State the following appears:

"Q. Do you know anything of the counsel upon the other side? A. No, sir.

"Q. You have men under you assisting you in shipping? A. No; there are no men under me.

"Q. Do you belong to any labor organization? A. No, sir.

"Q. You stated, I believe, that you didn't know much about anarchism or communism, and therefore you couldn't tell whether you had a prejudice or not. A. No, sir, I do not.

"Q. But you have read something about socialism? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Do you believe in the maintenance of the laws of the State of Illinois and the Government of the United States? A. Yes, sir; I do.

"Q. Have you any sympathy with any individual or class of individuals who have for their purpose or object the overthrow of the law by force? A. No, sir.

"Q. Have you any conscientious scruples against the infliction of the death penalty in proper cases? A. No, sir.

"Q. If taken as a juror in this case do you believe you could determine the innocence or guilt of the defendants upon the proof presented to you here in court, under the instructions of the court, regardless of everything else? A. Yes, I think I could.

"Q. You know now of no prejudice or bias that would interfere with your duties as a juror? A. No, sir.

"Q. Are you a socialist, a communist, or an anarchist? A. No, sir.

"Q. You have no associations or affiliations with that class of people, so far as you know? A. No, sir."

At the close of this examination neither party challenged the juror peremptorily, and he was accepted and sworn. It is not denied that when this occurred the defendants were still entitled to 142 peremptory challenges, or about that number.

When the juror Sanford was called he was first examined by counsel for defendants, and after some preliminary questions and answers, the examination, still by counsel for the defendants, proceeded as follows:

"Q. You know what case is on trial now, I presume? A. Yes.

"Q. Have you any opinion as to the guilt or the innocence of the defendants or any of them, of the murder of Matthias J. Degan? A. I have.

"Q. You have an opinion; you say you have formed an opinion somewhat upon the question of the guilt or innocence of these defendants, do you mean, or that there was an offense committed at the Haymarket by the throwing of the bomb? A. Well, I would rather have you ask them one at a time.

"Q. All right. Have you an opinion as to whether or not there was an offense committed at the Haymarket meeting by the throwing of the bomb? A. Yes.

"Q. Now, from all that you have read and all that you have heard, have you an opinion as to the guilt or innocence of any of the eight defendants of the throwing of that bomb? A. Yes.

"Q. You have an opinion upon that question also? A. I have.

"Q. Did you ever sit on a jury? A. Never.

"Q. I suppose you know something about the duties of a juror? A. I presume so.

"Q. You understand, of course, that when a man is on trial, whether it be for his life or for any penal offense, that he can only be convicted upon testimony which is introduced in the presence and the hearing of the jury? You know that, don't you? A. Yes.

"Q. You know that any newspaper gossip or any street gossip has nothing to do with the matter whatever, and that the jury are to consider only the testimony which is admitted by the court actually, and then are to consider that testimony under the direction, as contained in the charge of the court; you understand that? A. Yes.

"Q. Now, if you should be selected as a juror in this case to try and determine it, do you believe that you could exercise legally the duties of a juror—that you could listen to the testimony, and all of the testimony, and the charge of the court, and after deliberation return a verdict which would be right and fair as between the defendants and the people of the State of Illinois? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. You believe that you could do that? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. You could fairly and impartially listen to the testimony that is introduced here? A. Yes.

"Q. And the charge of the court and render an impartial verdict, you believe? A. Yes.

"Q. Have you any knowledge of the principles contended for by socialists, communists, and anarchists? A. Nothing, except what I read in the papers.

"Q. Just general reading? A. Yes,

"Q. You are not a socialist, I presume, or a communist? A. No, sir.

"Q. Have you a prejudice against them from what you have read in the papers? A. Decided.

"Q. A decided prejudice against them? Do you believe that that would influence your verdict in this case, or would you try the real issue which is here, as to whether these defendants were guilty of the murder of Mr. Degan or not, or would you try the question of socialism or anarchism, which really has nothing to do with the case? A. Well, as I know so little about it in reality at present, it is a pretty hard question to answer.

"Q. You would undertake—you would attempt, of course, to try the case upon the evidence introduced here—upon the issue which is presented here? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Now, the issue, and the only issue which will be presented to this jury, unless it is presented with some other motive than to arrive at the truth, I think is, did these men throw the bomb which killed officer Degan? If not, did they aid, abet, encourage, assist, or advise somebody else to do it? Now, that is all there is in this case; no question of socialism or anarchism to be determined, or as to whether it is right or wrong. Now, do you believe that you can try it upon that theory and return a verdict upon that theory and upon that issue? A. Well, suppose I have an opinion in my own mind that they encouraged it?

"Q. Keep it—that they encouraged it? A. Yes.

"Q. Well then, so far as that is concerned I do not care very much what your opinion may be now, for your opinion now is made up of random conversations and from newspaper reading, as I understand? A. Yes.

"Q. That is nothing reliable. You do not regard that as being in the nature of sworn testimony at all, do you? A. No.

"Q. Now, when the testimony is introduced here and the witnesses are examined and cross examined, you see them and look into their countenances, judge who are worthy of belief and who are not worthy of belief. Don't you think then you would be able to determine the question? A. Yes.

"Q. Regardless of any impression that you might have, or any opinion? A. Yes.

"Q. Have you any opposition to the organization by laboring men of associations, or societies, or unions, so far as they have reference to their own advancement and protection, and are not in violation of law? A. No, sir.

"Q. Mr. Sanford, do you know any of the members of the police force of the City of Chicago? A. Not one by name.

"Q. You are not acquainted with any one that was either injured or killed, I suppose, at the Haymarket meeting? A. No.

"Q. Mr. Sanford, are you acquainted with any gentleman representing the prosecution—these three gentlemen, Mr. Grinnell, Mr. Ingham, Mr. Walker, and Mr. Furthman, who is not here at the present time? A. No, sir.

"Q. You are, I presume, not acquainted with any of the detective officers of the City of Chicago? A. Not to my knowledge.

"Q. Now, Mr. Sanford, if you should be selected as a juror in this case, do you believe that, regardless of all prejudice or opinion which you now have, you could listen to the legitimate testimony introduced in court and upon that and that alone render and return a fair and impartial, unprejudiced and unbiased verdict? A. Yes."

At the close of this examination on the part of the defendants, the juror was challenged in their behalf for cause, and the attorney for the State, after it was ascertained that all the peremptory challenges of the defendants had been exhausted, took up the examination of the juror; and as to this the record shows the following:

"Mr. Ingham: Mr. Sanford, upon what is your opinion founded—upon newspaper reports? A. Well, it is founded on the general theory and what I read in the newspapers.

"Q. And what you read in the papers? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Have you ever talked with any one who was present at the Haymarket at the time the bomb was thrown? A. No, sir.

"Q. Have you ever talked with any one who professed, of his own knowledge, to know anything about the connection of the defendants with the throwing of that bomb? A. No.

"Q. Have you ever said to any one whether or not you believed the statements of facts in the newspapers to be true? A. I have never expressed it exactly in that way, but still I have no reason to think they were false.

"Q. Well, the question is not what your opinion of that was. The question simply is—it is a question made necessary by our statute, perhaps— A. Well, I don't recall whether I have or not.

"Q. So far as you know, then, you never have? A. No, sir.

"Q. Do you believe that if taken as a juror you can try this case fairly and impartially, and render a verdict upon the law and the evidence? A. Yes."

At this stage of the examination the court remarked in reply to some suggestion of counsel as follows:

"The Court: The defendants having challenged for cause, which is overruled, can, of course, stand where they are without saying anything more; but the effect of that, in my judgment, is that they accept the juror because they can't help themselves. They have got no peremptory challenge; the challenge for cause is overruled, and, necessarily, the question now is for the State to say whether they will accept this juror or not. The common law is that all jurors not challenged, or to whom the challenge is not sustained, are the jurors to try the case. If they are not challenged for a cause which is sustained, and if they are not challenged peremptorily, then they are necessarily the jury to try the case. Now, in this instance, the defendants have no more peremptory challenges, and the challenge which they have made for cause is overruled; therefore, so far as the defendants are concerned, he is a juror to try the case."

This was accepted by both parties as a true statement of the then condition of the case, and after some further examination of the juror, which elicited nothing of importance in connection with the present inquiry, no peremptory challenge having been interposed by the State, Sanford was sworn as a juror, and the panel was then complete.

This, so far as we have been advised, presents all there is in the record which this court can consider touching the challenges of these two jurors by the defendants for cause.

In Reynolds v. United States, 98 U. S. 145, 156 [25:244, 247], we said "that upon the trial of the issue of fact raised by" a challenge to a juror, in a criminal case, on the ground that he had formed and expressed an opinion as to the issues to be tried, "the court will practically be called upon to determine whether the nature and strength of the opinion formed are such as in law necessarily to raise the presumption of partiality. The question thus presented is one of mixed law and fact, and to be tried, as far as the facts are concerned, like any other issue of that character, upon the evidence. The finding of the trial court upon that issue ought not to be set aside by a reviewing court, unless the error is manifest. * * * It must be made clearly to appear that upon the evidence the court ought to have found the juror had formed such an opinion that he could not in law be deemed impartial. The case must be one in which it is manifest the law left nothing to the 'conscience or discretion' of the court." If such is the degree of strictness which is required in the ordinary cases of writs of error from one court to another in the same general jurisdiction, it certainly ought not to be relaxed in a case where, as in this, the ground relied on for the reversal by this court of a judgment of the highest court of the State is, that the error complained of is so gross as to amount in law to a denial by the State of a trial by an impartial jury to one who is accused of crime. We are unhesitatingly of opinion that no such case is disclosed by this record.

We come now to consider the objection that the defendant Spies was compelled by the court to be a witness against himself. He voluntarily offered himself as a witness in his own behalf, and by so doing he became bound to submit to a proper cross examination under the law and practice in the jurisdiction where he was being tried. The complaint is, that he was required on cross examination to state whether he had received a certain letter, which was shown, purporting to have been written by Johann Most, and addressed to him, and upon his saying that he had, the court allowed the letter to be read in evidence against him. This, it is claimed, was not proper cross examination. It is not contended that the subject to which the cross examination related was not pertinent to the issue to be tried; and whether a cross examination must be confined to matters pertinent to the testimony-in-chief, or may be extended to the matters in issue, is certainly a question of state law as administered in the courts of the State, and not of federal law.

Something was said in argument about an alleged unreasonable search and seizure of the papers and property of some of the defendants, and their use in evidence on the trial of the case. Special reference is made in this connection to the letter of Most about which Spies was cross examined; but we have not been referred to any part of the record in which it appears that objection was made to the use of this evidence on that account. And upon this point the Supreme Court of the State, in that part of its opinion which has been printed with the motion papers, remarks as follows:

"The objection that the letter was obtained from the defendant by an unlawful seizure is made for the first time in this court. It was not made on the trial in the court below. Such an objection as this, which is not suggested by the nature of the offered evidence, but depends upon the proof of an outside fact, should have been made on the trial. The defense should have proved that the Most letter was one of the letters illegally seized by the police and should then have moved to exclude or oppose its admission on the ground that it was obtained by such illegal seizure. This was not done, and therefore we cannot consider the constitutional question supposed to be involved."

Even if the court was wrong in saying that it did not appear that the Most letter was one of the papers illegally seized, it still remains uncontradicted that objection was not made in the trial court to its admission on that account. To give us jurisdiction under section 709 of the Revised Statutes because of the denial by a state court of any title, right, privilege or immunity claimed under the Constitution, or any treaty or statute of the United States, it must appear on the record that such title, right, privilege or immunity was "specially set up or claimed" at the proper time and in the proper way. To be reviewable here the decision must be against the right so set up or claimed. As the Supreme Court of the State was reviewing the decision of the trial court, it must appear that the claim was made in that court, because the supreme court was only authorized to review the judgment for errors committed there, and we can do no more. This is not, as seems to be supposed by one of the counsel for the petitioners, a question of the waiver of a right under the Constitution, laws or treaties of the United States, but a question of claim. If the right was not set up or claimed in the proper court below, the judgment of the highest court of the State in the action is conclusive, so far as the right of review here is concerned. The question whether the letter, if obtained in the manner alleged, would have been competent evidence is not before us, and, therefore, no foundation is laid under this objection for the exercise of our jurisdiction.

As to the suggestion by counsel for the petitioners Spies and Fielden—Spies having been born in Germany and Fielden in Great Britain—that they have been denied by the decision of the court below rights guaranteed to them by Treaties between the United States and their respective countries, it is sufficient to say that no such questions were made and decided in either of the courts below, and they cannot be raised in this court for the first time. Besides, we have not been referred to any treaty, neither are we aware of any, under which such a question could be raised.

The objection that the defendants were not actually present in the Supreme Court of the State at the time sentence was pronounced cannot be made on the record as it now stands, because on its face it shows that they were present. If this is not in accordance with the fact, the record must be corrected below, not here. It will be time enough to consider whether the objection presents a federal question when the correction has been made.

Being of opinion, therefore, that the federal questions presented by the counsel for the petitioners, and which they say they desire to argue, are not involved in the determination of the case as it appears on the face of the record, we deny the writ.

Petition for writ of error is dismissed.

DON C. TUFTS, Admr. of the Estate of ELMIRA P. TUFTS, Deceased.

Variance between bill and proof.

In a suit in equity for relief on the ground of fraud, it is enough if the facts found are not materially and substantially different from those alleged in the bill.

Submitted Oct. 21, 1887. Decided Oct. 31, 1887.

APPEAL from the Supreme Court of the Territory of Utah. Affirmed.

The facts are stated by the court.

Messrs. Ben Sheeks and J. L. Rawlins, for appellant:

The material findings are not within the issues presented by the bill of complaint.

The defendant was arraigned upon specific charges of fraud, but was concluded by the court with findings of fraud not alleged.

The decree cannot be sustained on the ground of mistake, as a substantive head of equity jurisdiction. It is not framed in that aspect nor will the findings support a decree on this ground.

Kerr. Fraud & M. 407; Grymes v. Sanders, 93 U. S. 61 (23: 801); Glen v. Statler, 42 Iowa, 107; Butman v. Hussey, 30 Me. 263; Juzan v. Toulmin, 9 Ala. 662; Hill v. Bush, 19 Ark. 552.

Mr. Arthur Brown, for appellee:

There is no foundation whatsoever for the alleged variance.

Where one person has been misled into signing a different paper from that which he supposed he was signing, and another person, so misleading him, has taken advantage of it, the former can either reform or set aside the instrument entirely. It is not necessary that the mistake be a mistake of both parties. A mistake of one party, of which the other knows and takes advantage, is a mistake and fraud also.

The complaint states a clear case entitling the plaintiff to relief by this court, in the form of a rescission.

Welles v. Yates, 44 N. Y. 525; Hearst v. Pujol, 44 Cal. 230; Eaton v. Eaton, 37 N. J. L. 108; Case v. Case, 26 Mich. 484.

This is a suit in equity begun on the first of August, 1882, by Elmira P. Tufts, then in life, against Elbridge Tufts, her son, to set aside a deed executed by her to him, bearing date June 26, 1882, on the ground that it was obtained by fraud. The material averment in the complaint is that "defendant * * * promised the plaintiff in the month of June, 1882, if she would execute an agreement, which he then, on or about said June 26, 1882, had drawn up and read to plaintiff, * * * that the defendant would build the plaintiff, at his own expense, a nice brick house upon his, said defendant's lot of land, situated immediately east of and adjoining on the eastern portion of the above described lot of land, which was owned by the plaintiff, * * * and give her a life lease of the same to use to her own benefit, free from any and all expense to her during her natural life, said brick building to be commenced by defendant as soon as the plaintiff would sign said written agreement then drawn up by the defendant;" and that the deed was signed and executed under the belief, induced by the false and fraudulent statements of the defendant, that it was that agreement. At the hearing the court made, among others, the following finding of fact:

"That at the time of the execution of said deed plaintiff did not know that it was a deed of her property in question, but believed it to be a life lease of property belonging to the defendant, upon which she was agreeing to assist in building a house; that prior to the time of the execution of said deed there had been negotiations between the said plaintiff and the said defendant to the effect that the plaintiff should assist defendant with money to build a house upon lands of his own, and that the plaintiff should have a life lease of the same; that after such negotiations had taken place she directed defendant to prepare the proper papers; that defendant, instead of preparing the papers directed by plaintiff, prepared a warrantee deed of the land in question, and procured the signature of the plaintiff thereto; that the same was not read to the plaintiff, and she did not know the contents thereof; that there was no consideration for the same passed between the parties, and that the plaintiff signed the same under the belief that it was a paper relative to a life lease to her of the said land of the defendant upon which said building was to be erected; that the signature of the plaintiff to the said deed was procured by the fraud of the defendant; that the defendant never has attempted to build any such house as was contemplated by the agreement for the life lease."

Upon this finding a decree was entered declaring the deed null and void, and directing the defendant to reconvey to the plaintiff. From that decree this appeal was taken.

The objection now urged to the decree is, not that it is wrong upon the facts found, but that the findings make a different case from that alleged in the complaint. To this we cannot agree. The suit was brought to set aside the deed because it was executed in the belief, caused by the false and fraudulent statements of the defendant, that it was an agreement under which the plaintiff was to have a life lease of property belonging to the defendant, and not a deed conveying her own property absolutely in fee to him. That is substantially the finding of the court, and, in a suit in equity for relief on the ground of fraud, it is enough if the facts found are not materially and substantially different from those alleged in the bill.

CATHERINE HENDERSON, Plff. in Err.,
v.
LOUISVILLE AND NASHVILLE RAILROAD COMPANY.

Liability of railroad company for loss—amended petition.

1. Where a passenger in a railroad car in attempting to close an open window next her seat, dropped out through the window, upon the railroad, a bag, which she had in her hand and custody, containing money and jewelry, of the value of which she had not informed the company, and she immediately told the conductor of the train of the loss and requested him to stop the train in order that she might get the bag, which he refused to do, and she dispatched a messenger from the next station, about three miles distant, to recover the bag, but found that it had been stolen and it and its contents were lost, held, that an action would not lie against the railroad company for the loss.

2. Where the action against the railroad company for such loss was dismissed, but before judgment was signed, plaintiff by leave of the court filed an amended petition, alleging that the railroad company received the bag and its contents as part of her luggage to be safely carried and delivered, and that the company did not so carry and deliver, held, under the practice in Louisiana, that it was within the power of the court to treat the amendment as a mere addition to the original petition and thus preclude the plaintiff from contesting a material fact within her own knowledge, which she had therein averred.

3. In an action on the common-law side of the circuit court, the pleadings and practice are governed by the law of the State.

Argued Oct. 21, 1887. Decided Oct 31, 1887.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Louisiana. Affirmed.

Reported below, 20 Fed. Rep. 430.

This case comes to this court upon the plaintiff's petition, and her amended or supplementary petition, and the defendant's exception (demurrer) thereto. Under the law of Louisiana, a defendant's exception to a plaintiff's petition is, in effect, a demurrer. It may be general or special.

The exception here is general, for it alleges that the plaintiff has no just and legal cause of action.

The plaintiff had passed the summer at Pass Christian, and was returning to her winter residence in New Orleans. She placed her jewels and money in a small leathern bag (a bag commonly carried in the hands of women) and entered defendant's car at Pass Christian, as a passenger for New Orleans. The train had started,—the bag with her jewels and money accidentally fell through the car window; the conductor of the train being close to her when the bag fell through the window she begged him to stop the train and let her get off; she told him that the contents of the bag were of great value. He refused to stop the train, carried her on to the next station, three miles away from her jewels and money,—they were stolen from the place where they had fallen before she could get a person back to them. Nothing prevented the stopping of the train, it could have been accomplished in a few seconds, and could have proceeded without waiting for her, and she could have retaken her property.

The facts are further stated by the court.

Mr. O. B. Sansum for plaintiff in error:

If the defendant, under the then existing circumstances, could not or ought not to have stopped the train, it ought to plead and prove the facts, but the court below has no right to declare, as matter of law, that it was not bound to stop.

So long as the defendant was ignorant of the presence of the plaintiff's jewels and money upon its premises, no duty in respect to them was cast upon defendant; but, so soon as defendant (the conductor authorized to act for it) knew that the money and jewels had accidentally fallen upon the road, then it was bound to do what a reasonably prudent person, acting for himself under the same or similar circumstances, would have done to prevent loss and damage. If, under the same circumstances, a reasonably prudent person acting for himself would have stopped the train and let the plaintiff depart from it to retake her property, then it was defendant's duty to do the same, and its failure to do it is contra the maxim sic utere tuo, ut alienum non lædas.

The court erred in sustaining defendant's exception to plaintiff's amended petition.

Mr. Thos. L. Bayne, for defendant in error:

Upon the hearing below, the court delivered an opinion which is reported in the Federal Reporter, vol. xx, p. 430.

In a note to this decision the editor of the Federal Reporter cited: First Nat. Bk. v. Marietta & C. R. R. Co. 20 Ohio St. 278; Gleason v. *Goodrich Transp. In Clark v. Burns, 118 Mass. 275, the court says: "The defendants, as owners of steamboats carrying passengers and goods for hire, were not innkeepers.

A watch, worn by a passenger on his person by day and kept by him within reach for use at night, whether retained upon his person or placed under his pillow, or in a pocket of his clothing hanging near him, is not so entrusted to their custody and control as to make them liable for it as common carriers.

The plaintiff cannot amend her petition by making allegations inconsistent with what she had averred therein. She could not thereby avoid the judicial admissions and averments of her first petition.

The dismissal of a petition which discloses no cause of action disposes of the suit, and no amendment can then be allowed.

Hart v. Bowie, 34 La. Ann. 325.

Mr. Justice Gray delivered the opinion of the court:

This was an action against a railroad corporation by a passenger to recover for the loss of a hand bag and its contents.

The plaintiff, a married woman suing by authority of her husband, alleged in the original petition that on October 25, 1883, the defendant, being a common carrier of goods and persons for hire, received her into one of its cars as a passenger from her summer residence at Pass Christian in the State of Mississippi to her winter residence in New Orleans, having in her hand, and in her immediate custody, possession and control, a leathern bag of a kind usually carried by women of her condition and station in society, containing $5,800 in bank bills, and jewelry worth $4,075; that while the plaintiff, holding the bag in her hand, was attempting to close an open window next her seat, through which a cold wind was blowing upon her, the bag and its contents, by some cause unknown to her, accidentally fell from her hand through the open window upon the railroad; that she immediately told the conductor of the train that the bag contained property of hers of great value, and requested him to stop the train, and to allow her to leave the car and retake the bag and its contents; but he refused to do so, although nothing hindered or prevented him, and, against her protestations, caused the train to proceed at great speed for three miles to Bay St. Louis, where he stopped the train, and she despatched a trusty person to the place where the bag had fallen; but before he arrived there the bag with its contents was stolen and carried away by some person or persons to the plaintiff unknown, "and was wholly lost to the plaintiff by the gross negligence of the defendant as aforesaid."

The further averments of the petition, undertaking to define specifically the nature and effect of the obligation assumed by the defendant to the plaintiff, are mere conclusions of law, not admitted by the exception, in the nature of a demurrer, which was filed by the defendant, in accordance with the practice in Louisiana, upon the ground that the petition set forth no cause of action. The circuit court sustained the exception, and ordered the petition to be dismissed. 20 Fed. Rep. 430.

On the day the judgment was rendered, and before it was signed, it was amended, on the plaintiff's motion, by adding the words "unless the plaintiff amend her petition so as to state a cause of action within five days."

Within that time the plaintiff filed an amended petition, alleging that the defendant received the plaintiff as a passenger, and the bag and its contents as part of her luggage, to be safely kept and carried by the defendant as a common carrier to New Orleans, and there delivered to the plaintiff; that the defendant did not so carry and deliver; and that the things were lost by the negligence and improper conduct of the defendant, and not by any want of care on the part of the plaintiff.

The defendant excepted to the amended petition, because the plaintiff had no right to file one after the original petition had been dismissed as aforesaid, and because the amended petition was inconsistent with the original petition, especially in that the original petition alleged that the bag and its contents were held and kept by the plaintiff in her immediate possession, control and custody, whereas the amended petition alleged that the defendant received them as her luggage.

After argument on this exception, the order allowing the plaintiff to file an amended petition was modified by the court so as to provide that the amended petition should be deemed and should have effect only as an addition to the original petition; and the exception to the amended petition was sustained, and the action dismissed. The plaintiff sued out this writ of error.

The mere statement of the case is sufficient to demonstrate the correctness of the judgment below.

The facts alleged in the original petition constitute no breach or neglect of duty on the part of the defendant towards the plaintiff. She did not entrust her bag to the exclusive custody and care of the defendant's servants, but kept it in her own immediate possession, without informing the defendant of the value of its contents, until after it had dropped from her hand through the open window. Even if no negligence is to be imputed to her in attempting to shut the window with the bag in her hand, yet her dropping the bag was not the act of the defendant or its servants, nor anything that they were bound to foresee or to guard against; and after it had happened, she had no legal right, for the purpose of relieving her from the consequences of an accident for which they were not responsible, to require them to stop the train, short of a usual station, to the delay and inconvenience of other passengers, and the possible risk of collision with other trains.

This action being on the common-law side of the circuit court, the pleadings and practice were governed by the law of the State. Rev. Stat. § 914. By article 419 of the Code of Practice of Louisiana, "After issue joined, the plaintiff may, with the leave of the court, amend his original petition; provided the amendment does not alter the substance of his demand by making it different from the one originally brought." An amendment wholly inconsistent with the allegations of the original petition cannot be allowed. Barrow v. Bank of Louisiana, 2 La. Ann. 453. It is by no means clear that a petition, which has been dismissed as showing no cause of action, can be afterwards amended in matter of substance. Hart v. Bowie, 34 La. Ann. 323. But if the order allowing an amended petition to be filed could be lawfully made in this case, so long as final judgment had not been entered, it was equally within the power of the court to modify that order so as to treat the amendment as a mere addition to the original petition, and thus to preclude the plaintiff from contesting a material fact, within her own knowledge, which she had once solemnly averred.

DAVENPORT NATIONAL BANK, Plff. in Err.,
v.
BOARD OF EQUALIZATION OF DAVENPORT ET AL.

Equal taxation—state and national banks—savings banks.

1. The Act of Congress does not require a perfect equality of taxation between state and national banks, but only that the shares of the national bank shall not be taxed at a higher rate than other moneyed capital in the hands of individuals.

2. It is only necessary that the system of state taxation of its own citizens, of its own banks and of its own corporations shall not work a discrimination unfavorable to the holders of the shares of the national banks. Within these limits, the manner of assessing and collecting all taxes by the State is uncontrolled by the Act of Congress.

3. While deposits in savings banks constitute moneyed capital in the hands of individuals, yet they are not within the meaning of the Act of Congress in such a sense as to require that because they are exempted from taxation, the shares of stock in national banks must also be exempted.

Submitted Oct. 11, 1887. Decided Oct. 31, 1887.

IN ERROR to the Supreme Court of the State of Iowa. Affirmed.

Under the Statutes of the State of Iowa the shares in the national banks are taxable at their cash value; but the shares in the banks organized under the state laws—and known as savings banks—are not taxable at all. It is claimed that this is a discrimination unfavorable to the national banks and their shareholders, and repugnant to section 5219, R. S. U. S., which prohibits a State from taxing the national bank shares "at a greater rate than is assessed upon other moneyed capital in the hands of individual citizens;" and also repugnant to the Fourteenth Amendment, which declares that the State shall not deny to any person "the equal protection of the law."

The plaintiff appeared before the Board of Equalization of Taxes and asked that the taxes assessed under said statutes be canceled, and that the bank be taxed upon its capital (less its bonds and other nontaxables, and less its real estate, which is specifically taxed), the same as said savings banks are by the statutes taxable. The Board of Equalization refused to do this, and on appeal, the circuit court, and the supreme court, sustained the Board in its action.

Messrs. A. J. Hirschl and W. T. Dittoe, for plaintiff in error:

To tax a bank upon its capital is different from and less onerous than taxing it upon its shares.

Van Allen v. Assessors, 70 U. S. 3 Wall. 581 (18: 233); Hubbard v. Supervisors, 23 Iowa, 133; Pollard v. State, 65 Ala. 628.

Section 5219 protects the national banks, not only against discriminative rates of assessment, but also against discriminative methods and rules of assessment, and of valuation.

People v. Weaver, 100 U. S. 545-6 (25: 707); Pelton v. Commercial Nat. Bank, 101 U. S. 143 (25: 901).

Under section 5219, R. S. U. S., the State cannot tax national bank shares at a greater rate than is assessed upon "other moneyed capital in the hands of individuals," and shares in the incorporated state banks are such "other moneyed capital."

Hepburn v. School Directors, 90 U. S. 23 Wall. 484 (23: 112).

They are also the "like property similarly invested," referred to in Adams v. Nashville, 95 U. S. 22 (24: 370), quoting and construing the very words of section 5219.

If the national bank share is taxed higher than the state bank share, then the tax on the former should be reduced to the amount of the tax on the latter,

City Nat. Bank v. Paducah, 5 Cent. L. J. 347; S. C. Thomp. Nat. Bk. Cas. 300.

The national bank shares are entitled to all the benefits enjoyed by the state bank shares.

Pollard v. State, 65 Ala. 628; Miller v. Heilbron, 58 Cal. 133; Loftin v. Citizens Nat. Bank, 85 Ind. 341.

"As long as they (national banks) are allowed to stand on the same footing with the citizen and similar state institutions in the matter of taxation, they have no right to complain."

Boyer's App. Pitts. L. J. N. S. XIV, 429.

Consequently when the state bank share is, by statute, exempted from taxation, the holder of the national bank share can claim exemption for his.

As his tax is not void, but only voidable, he must appear before the Board of Equalization, otherwise he has no redress.

The shares in these Iowa savings banks are precisely similar to the shares in the national banks.

These (alleged) savings banks are such only in name; they are full fledged banks of discount and deposit; formidable rivals of the national banks, and transact a very heavy business. The two savings banks in Davenport have over $3,200,000 deposits, being nearly $2,000,000 more than all the three national banks together in said city. According to section 9, chapter 60, Acts 15th General Assembly (McClain's Annotated Statutes, pp. 311 et seq.), these savings banks "may discount, purchase, sell, and make loans upon commercial paper, notes, bills of exchange, drafts, or any other personal or public security." By sections 20, 21, they have the monopoly; no one else can advertise as a savings bank.

This is evidently meant to be the general law, for section 31 allows any other bank to reincorporate as a savings bank by simply filing a declaration to that effect.

Sheren v. Mendenhall, 23 Minn. 92.

In construing said section 5219, it has been held that national bank shares can be taxed although other dissimilar moneyed capital is exempt, as for instance:

State and county bonds.

McLaughlin v. Chadwell, 7 Heisk. (Tenn.) 397.

Shares in insurance companies.

Purchase money, mortgages, and judgments —especially where taxing them would make a double taxation.

Adams v. Nashville, 95 U. S. 19 (24: 369).

And national bank shares can be taxed when state bank shares are not, provided, that the state by contract, made prior to the Act of Congress, did disable itself from taxing the state bank shares.

Lionberger v. Rouse, 76 U. S. 9 Wall. 473 (19: 724); Richmond v. Scott, 48 Ind. 571.

But in all the cases in which the question was raised, under said section 5219, whether national bank shares can be taxed differently from "other (similar) moneyed capital,"—viz., state bank shares,—it has been held, without exception, that the national bank shares are (under said section 5219), entitled to all the privileges enjoyed by the shares in the state banks.

See City Nat. Bank v. Paducah, 5 Cent. L. J. 347; S. C. Thomp. Nat. Bank Cas. 300; Pollard v. State, 65 Ala. 628; Miller v. Heilbron, 58 Cal. 133; Loftin v. Citizens Nat. Bank, 85 Ind. 341.

The Fourteenth Amendment prohibits discriminative taxation, unless discrimination is necessary, owing to the different natures of the taxables.

San Mateo County v. Southern Pac. R. Co. 13 Fed. Rep. 722; Santa Clara County v. Southern Pac. R. Co. 18 Fed. Rep. 385.

Messrs. L. M. Fisher, C. A. Ficke, and E. E. Cook, for defendants in error:

By the laws of Iowa, all real and personal property not exempted from taxation by sections 797, 798 and 800, Code of Iowa, is liable to taxation.

Code of Iowa, § 801.

The only forms of moneyed capital exempted by the sections referred to are the moneys and credits of public corporations and of scientific, literary, benevolent and religious institutions, and societies devoted exclusively to their support.

Id. § 797.

There is no federal question involved in this case and the writ of error must be dismissed.

Austin v. Aldermen, 74 U. S. 7 Wall. 694 (19: 224).

Are savings bank shares taxable?

15 Gen. Assem. chap. 60, § 1; McClain's Code, p. 311.

"The stock of corporations and companies shall be assessed at their cash value."

Moreover, taxation is the rule and exemption the exception, in considering the liability of property to taxation. Statutes are construed strictly against exemption.

Henkle v. Keota, 68 Iowa, 334; Davenport Water Co. v. Davenport, 64 Iowa, 55.

There is no statute of Iowa exempting the shares of savings banks from taxation. The exemption is only claimed by plaintiff from the following provision of the savings bank law:

15th Gen. Assem. chap. 60, § 28, McClain's Code, p 319; Cook v. Burlington, 59 Iowa, 251.

"Nothing (against the power of taxation) is to be taken by inference or presumption." "Where a doubt arises as to the existence of restrictions, it must be decided in favor of the State."

Bank of Commerce v. Tennessee, 104 U. S. 493 (26: 810).

The capital stock and the shares may both be taxed and it is not double taxation.

If savings bank shares are nontaxable, is there a substantial discrimination against national bank shares?

U. S. v. Union Pac. R. R. Co. 91 U. S. 72 (23: 224); Lionberger v. Rouse, 76 U. S. 9 Wall. 468 (19: 721); Mercantile Nat. Bank v. New York, 121 U. S. 138 (30: 895); Davenport Nat. Bank v. Board of Equalization, 64 Iowa, 144.

It is not absolute equality that is contemplated by the Act of Congress. A rule which rests upon the ground that exact uniformity or equality of taxation cannot, in the nature of things, be expected or attained under any system.

Boyer v. Boyer, 113 U. S. 689 (28: 1089); Adams v Nashville, 95 U. S. 19 (24: 369).

This is a writ of error to the Supreme Court of the State of Iowa.

The question presented grows out of the allegation on the part of the Bank, which is a national bank located in Iowa, that the shares of its stock are taxed at a rate which is in excess of the taxes levied upon other moneyed capital of the State. The foundation of this allegation is that the statute of the State on this subject taxes savings banks, one of which is in the same town with the plaintiff, on the amount of its paid up capital, and does not tax the shares of those banks held by the individual shareholders. The case, passing through the proper stages in the state tribunals, was decided by the supreme court against the plaintiff.

The proposition of counsel seems to be, that the capital of savings banks can be taxed by the State in no other way than by an assessment upon the shares of that capital held by individuals, because, under the Act of Congress, the capital of the national banks can only be taxed in that way. It is strongly urged that in no other mode than by taxing the stockholders of each and all the banks can a perfect equality of taxation be obtained. The argument is not conclusive, if the proposition were sound; for the Act of Congress does not require a perfect equality of taxation between state and national banks, but only that the shares of the national banks shall not be taxed at a higher rate than other moneyed capital in the hands of individuals. That this does not mean entire equality is evident from the fact that, if the capital of the national banks were taxed at a much lower rate than other moneyed capital in the State, the banks would have no right to complain, and the law in that respect would not violate the provisions of the Act of Congress for the protection of national banks.

It has never been held by this court that the States should abandon systems of taxation of their own banks, or of money in the hands of their other corporations, which they may think the most wise and efficient modes of taxing their own corporate organizations, in order to make that taxation conform to the system of taxing the national banks upon the shares of their stock in the hands of their owners. All that has ever been held to be necessary is that the system of state taxation of its own citizens, of its own banks, and of its own corporations shall not work a discrimination unfavorable to the holders of the shares of the national banks. Nor does the Act of Congress require anything more than this; neither its language nor its purpose can be construed to go any farther. Within these limits, the manner of assessing and collecting all taxes by the States is uncontrolled by the Act of Congress.

In the case before us the same rate per cent is assessed upon the capital of the savings banks as upon the shares of the national banks. It does not satisfactorily appear from anything found in this record that this tax upon the moneyed capital of the savings banks is not as great as that upon the shares of stock in the national banks. It is not a necessary nor a probable inference from anything in this system of taxation that it should be so, and it is not shown by any actual facts in the record that it is so. If then neither the necessary, usual or probable effect of the system of assessment discriminates in favor of the savings banks against the national banks upon the face of the statute, nor any evidence is given of the intention of the Legislature to make such a discrimination, nor any proof that it works an actual and material discrimination, it is not a case for this court to hold the statute unconstitutional.

The whole subject has been recently considered by this court in the case of Mercantile Bank v. New York, 121 U. S. 138 [30: 895]. In that opinion it was held that, while the deposits in the savings banks of New York constituted moneyed capital in the hands of individuals, yet it was clear that they were not within the meaning of the Act of Congress in such a sense as to require that because they were exempted from taxation the shares of stock in national banks must also be exempted. The reason given for this is that the institutions generally established under that name are intended for the deposits of the small savings and accumulations of the industrious and thrifty; that to promote their growth and progress is the obvious interest and manifest policy of the State; and, as was said in Hepburn v. School Directors, 90 U. S. 23 Wall. 480 [23: 112], it could not have been the intention of Congress to exempt bank shares from taxation because some moneyed capital was exempt.

It is unnecessary to inquire whether the savings banks of Iowa are based upon principles similar to those of New York which were the subject of the opinion in The Mercantile Bank v. New York, for while in that case the savings banks were exempt from taxation, the Iowa Statute imposes a tax upon them equal to that imposed upon the shares of the national banks. The whole subject is so fully reviewed and reconsidered in that opinion, delivered less than a year ago, that it would be but a useless repetition to go farther into the question.

LORENZO BULL ET AL. Plffs. in Err.,
v.
FIRST NATIONAL BANK OF KASSON ET AL.

Bank check, what is—implied contract—check, when overdue—demand—set-off—current funds.

1. A regular bill of exchange may be in form similar to a bank check. But when the instrument is drawn upon a bank, or a person engaged in banking business, and simply directs the payment to a party named of a specified sum of money, which is at the time on deposit with the drawee without designating a future day of payment, the instrument is to be treated as a check rather than as a bill of exchange and the liability of parties thereto is to be determined accordingly.

2. A check implies a contract on the part of the drawer that he has funds in the hands of the drawee for its payment on presentation. If it is dishonored, the drawer is entitled to notice, but is not discharged from liability for the want of such notice unless he has sustained damages by the omission.

3. A check is not treated as overdue merely because it has not been presented as early as it might be, or as a bill of exchange is required to be to charge the drawer or indorser or transferrer. A check is not due until it is demanded.

4. Until such demand, the purchaser for a valuable consideration, without notice of any demand in the hands of the drawer against the person to whom the check is payable, is protected against its set-off.

5. The negotiability of a check is not affected by the fact that it is payable "in current funds."

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Minnesota. Reversed.

Statement by Mr. Justice Field:

This case comes before this court on a certificate of division of opinion between the circuit and district judges holding the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Minnesota. The action was upon two drafts, or bills of exchange (as they are termed in the record), each for $500, drawn by the First National Bank of Kasson in Minnesota upon the Ninth National Bank in New York City, and payable to the order of A. La Due, of which the following are copies:

"The First National Bank,
"$500. Kasson, Minn., Oct. 15, 1881.
"Pay to the order of Mr. A. La Due five hundred dollars in current funds.
"No. 18956. E. E. FAIRCHILD, Cashier.
"To Ninth National Bank, New York City.
"Indorsed: Pay to the order of M. Edison, Esq. A. La Due. M. Edison."

"First National Bank,
$500. Kasson, Minn., Oct. 15, 1881.
"Pay to the order of Mr. A. La Due five hundred dollars in current funds.
"No. 18754. E. E. FAIRCHILD, Cashier.
"To Ninth National Bank, New York City.
"Indorsed: Pay to the order of M. Edison, Esq. A. La Due. M. Edison."

The drafts or bills of exchange were immediately after their execution transferred by indorsement of the payee to one M. Edison, at Kasson, Minnesota. Edison was at the time largely indebted, and on the following day he absconded from Kasson, carrying the drafts with him. These drafts he retained in his possession until March 24, 1882, when, at Quincy, in Illinois, he sold and indorsed them for a valuable consideration to the plaintiffs, who had no notice of any set-off to them. The plaintiffs then forwarded them to New York City, where, on the 27th of March, they were presented for payment to the drawee, the Ninth National Bank of New York; and payment was refused by it. The drafts were then protested for nonpayment, and notice thereof given to the drawer and indorsers.

In the meantime the First National Bank of Kasson, the drawer of the drafts, had become the owner of certain demands against Edison, which, under the Statute of Minnesota, could be legally set off against its liability on the drafts in the hands of Edison, and also in the hands of the plaintiffs, unless they were protected against such set-off as innocent purchasers of the paper before maturity, and without notice of the set-off. At the time the drafts were drawn, and at the time of their presentation for payment, the Ninth National Bank of New York had in its hands money of the drawer sufficient to pay them.

The action was tried by the court without the intervention of a jury by stipulation of parties, and the facts stated above are embodied in its findings. Upon these facts the following question of law arose; viz., Whether the said drafts, or bills of exchange, were to be regarded as overdue and dishonored paper at the time they were presented by the plaintiffs to the drawee for payment and payment refused, so as to admit the set-off.

Upon this question the judges were divided in opinion, and, upon motion of plaintiffs, it was certified to this court for decision. The circuit judge who presided at the circuit, being of opinion that the question should be answered in the affirmative, ordered judgment for the defendant. To review this judgment, upon the certificate of division of opinion, the case is brought here on writ of error.

Mr. Wm. McFadon, for plaintiffs in error:

A bank cashier's check of the kind sued on in this case is not a bill of exchange at all, but is a bank check and subject to the laws governing bank checks.

Harrison v. Wright, 100 Ind. 515; Planters Bank v. Keesee, 7 Heisk. (Tenn.) 200; Planters Bank v. Merritt, Id. 198; Lester v. Given, 8 Bush, 357; First Nat. Bank of Cincinnati v. Coates, 8 McCrary, 9; Rosenthal v. Mastin Bank, 17 Blatchf. 318; 2 Dan. Neg. Inst. § 1567.

Being bank checks, the drawer bank is not discharged by any length of delay in presentment, at least not unless said drawer can show actual loss or injury to himself by reason of such delay,—as for example, by the failure of the drawee in the interval,—and then the discharge would only be pro tanto.

Morse, Banking, 2d ed. 260, 281; Merchants Bank v. State Bank, 77 U. S. 10 Wall. 647 (19:1019); Robinson v. Hawksford, 9 Ad. & E. N. S. 52; Cogswell v. Rockingham Ten Cent Sav. Bank, 59 N. H. 43; Stewart v. Smith, 17 Ohio St. 85; Murray v. Judah, 6 Cow. 490; Little v. Phœnix Bank, 2 Hill, 425; 2 Dan. Neg. Inst. § 1632.

A bank check is never overdue and dishonored until presentment thereof has been made to the drawee for payment, and payment thereof been refused by the drawee.

Merchants Bank v. State Bank, supra; Story, Prom. N. 3d ed. § 491; Lester v. Given, 8 Bush, 360; Morse, Banking, 2d ed. 283; Chitty, Bills, 7th Am. ed. 322; Murray v. Judah, 6 Cow. 489; Strong v. King, 35 Ill. 18.

The instrument as to the drawer is not due for set-off until such presentation shall have been first made.

McGough v. Jamison, 107 Pa. 342; Shute v. Pacific Nat. Bank, 136 Mass. 488; Munger v. Albany City Nat. Bank, 85 N. Y. 580; Bellows Falls Bank v. Rutland County Bank, 40 Vt. 377.

The doctrine of presentation of a check to the drawee within a reasonable time is one governing between indorser and indorsee when the question is as to the liability of the indorsee; but, as between the holder of such check and the drawer, this doctrine has no application where the drawee has remained solvent and the drawer has lost nothing by the delay, the reason being that the drawer is treated as the principal debtor.

In determining what is a reasonable time, regard will always be had to the character of the instrument.

Dealing as we are with bank drafts, there was no such delay in presentation in this case as was unreasonable.

Bank drafts are not due until presented to the drawee.

No construction should be given to any statutes of Minnesota, authorizing set-offs, which would impair the value of bank drafts as circulating medium.

Mr. Charles C. Willson, for defendants in error:

An instrument to be a bill of exchange must be payable in money, in such coin or national currency as is by law a legal tender in the payment of debts.

Not being payable in money but in current funds they were not bills of exchange, and the circuit court had not jurisdiction of this action.

The Supreme Court of Minnesota also held, in a suit upon another of this series of drafts, that the set-off must be allowed.

The draft is not past due until a reasonable time has elapsed in which to present it for payment in the due course of business.

Minn. Gen. Stat. 1878, chap. 23, § 11.

In the following cases the delay without a statutory rule was held fatal:

5 months: Sice v. Cunningham, 1 Cow. 397.

1 year: Hart v. Eastman, 7 Minn. 74.

11 days was in time: National Newark Banking Co. v. Second Nat. Bank of Erie, 63 Pa. 404.

By their terms, these bills were payable on demand, without grace.

1 Dan. Neg. Inst. § 617, note 6.

If the bills were not presented in a reasonable time for payment, so as to charge the indorser, then under the same circumstances, set-off against the dilatory holder can be maintained as against his transferee.

1 Dan. Neg. Inst. §§ 611, 617, 467, 418, 469.

These drafts, being payable on demand, should have been presented in a reasonable time. If not so presented, they are deemed overdue.

The certificate of division of opinion does not state or set forth a question of law, but a mixed question of both law and fact.

In the record, the instruments upon which the action is brought are designated as "drafts or bills of exchange." In a general sense, they may be thus designated; for they are orders of one party upon another for the payment of money, which is the essential characteristic of drafts or bills of exchange. They are also negotiable, and pass by delivery, and are within the description of instruments of that character in the Act of March 3, 1875, prescribing the jurisdiction of Circuit Courts of the United States. But, in strictness, they are bank checks. They have all the particulars in which such instruments differ or may differ from regular bills of exchange. They are drawn upon a bank having funds of the drawer for their payment, and they are payable upon demand, although the time of payment is not designated in them. A bill of exchange may be so drawn, but it usually states the time of payment, and days of grace are allowed upon it. There are no days of grace upon checks.

The instruments here are also drawn in the briefest form possible in orders for the payment of money, which is the usual characteristic of checks. A bill of exchange is generally drawn with more formality, and payment at sight, or at a specified number of days after date, is requested, and that the amount be charged to the drawer's account. When intended for transmission to another State or country, they are usually drawn in duplicate or triplicate, and designated as first, second or third of exchange. A regular bill of exchange, it is true, may be in a form similar to a bank check, so that it may sometimes be difficult, from their form, to distinguish between the two classes of instruments. But when the instrument is drawn upon a bank, or a person engaged in banking business, and simply directs the payment to a party named of a specified sum of money, which is at the time on deposit with the drawee, without designating a future day of payment, the instrument is to be treated as a check rather than as a bill of exchange, and the liability of parties thereto is to be determined accordingly. If the instrument designates a future day for its payment, it is, according to the weight of authorities, to be deemed a bill of exchange, when, without such designation, it would be treated as a check. Bowen v. Newell, 8 N. Y. 190.

The instruments upon which the action is brought being bank checks, the liability of the parties is determinable by the rules governing such paper. A check implies a contract on the part of the drawer that he has funds in the hands of the drawee for its payment on presentation. If it is dishonored the drawer is entitled to notice, but, unlike the drawer of a bill of exchange, he is not discharged from liability for the want of such notice unless he has sustained damage, or is prejudiced in the assertion of his rights by the omission. In Merchants' Bank v. State Bank, 77 U. S. 10 Wall. 647, [19:1019], this court said: "Bank checks are not inland bills of exchange, but have many of the properties of such commercial paper; and many of the rules of the law merchant are alike applicable to both. Each is for a specific sum payable in money. In both cases there is a drawer, a drawee, and a payee. Without acceptance, no action can be maintained by the holder upon either against the drawee. The chief points of difference are that a check is always drawn on a bank or banker. No days of grace are allowed. The drawer is not discharged by the laches of the holder in presentment for payment, unless he can show that he has sustained some injury by the default. It is not due until payment is demanded, and the Statute of Limitations runs only from that time. It is by its face the appropriation of so much money of the drawer in the hands of the drawee to the payment of an admitted liability of the drawer. It is not necessary that the drawer of a bill should have funds in the hands of the drawee. A check in such case would be a fraud."

Similar language is used by Mr. Justice Story with reference to the time when checks are to be regarded as due. In stating the differences in point of law between checks and bills of exchange, he refers to the rule that a bill of exchange taken after the day of payment subjects the holder to all the equities attaching to it in the hands of the party from whom he receives it. "But," he adds, "this rule does not apply to a check, for it is not treated as overdue, although it is taken by the holder some days after its date, and it is payable on demand. On the contrary, the holder in such a case takes it, subject to no equities of which he has not, at the time, notice; for a check is not treated as overdue merely because it has not been presented as early as it might be, or as a bill of exchange is required to be, to charge the drawer, or indorser, or transferrer. One reason for this seems to be, that, strictly speaking, a check is not due until it is demanded." Prom. Notes, § 491. See also Re Brown, 2 Story, 502, 513.

Accepting these citations as correctly stating the law, the question presented for our decision is readily answered. The drawer was in no way injured or prejudiced in his rights by the delay of Edison to present the checks. The funds against which they were drawn remained undisturbed in the hands of the drawee, and therefore, the drawer had no cause of complaint. The instruments in suit were not overdue and dishonored when presented for payment. Until then the plaintiffs, as purchasers for a valuable consideration without notice of any demand against Edison, in the hands of the drawer, were protected against its set-off.

The certificate of division of opinion presents to us only one question, and yet, to answer that correctly, we must consider whether the negotiability of the instruments in suit was affected by the fact that they were payable "in current funds." Undoubtedly it is the law that, to be negotiable, a bill, promissory note or check, must be payable in money, or whatever is current as such by the law of the country where the instrument is drawn or payable. There are numerous cases where a designation of the payment of such instruments in notes of particular banks or associations, or in paper not current as money, has been held to destroy their negotiability. Irvine v. Lowry, 39 U. S. 14 Pet. 293 [10:462]; Miller v. Austen, 54 U. S. 13 How. 218, 228 [14:119, 123]. But within a few years, commencing with the first issue in this country of notes declared to have the quality of legal tender, it has been a common practice of drawers of bills of exchange or checks, or makers of promissory notes, to indicate whether the same are to be paid in gold or silver, or in such notes; and the term "current funds" has been used to designate any of these, all being current and declared, by positive enactment, to be legal tender. It was intended to cover whatever was receivable and current by law as money, whether in the form of notes or coin. Thus construed, we do not think the negotiability of the paper in question was impaired by the insertion of those words.

It follows from these views that the question certified to us must be answered in the negative. The judgment will, therefore, be reversed and the cause remanded, with directions to enter judgment for the plaintiffs upon the findings; and it is so ordered.

PARKER & WHIPPLE COMPANY ET AL., Appts., v. YALE CLOCK COMPANY ET AL.

Reissued letters patent—when invalid—question for the court—amended specification—Act of 1870—enlargement of claim—defense—general statement—void patent.

1. Reissued letters patent must be for the same invention.
2. Where it appears on a comparison of the two instruments, as matter of law, that the reissued patent is not for the same invention as that embraced and secured in the original patent, the reissued patent is invalid, as the commissioner in granting a new patent exceeded his jurisdiction.

2. Whether a reissued patent is for the same invention as that embodied in the original patent or for a different one is a question for the court in an equity suit, to be determined as a matter of construction, on a comparison of the two instruments, aided, if necessary, by the testimony of expert witnesses.

4. The specification may be amended so as to make it more clear and distinct; the claim may be modified so as to make it more conformable to the exact rights of the patentee; but the invention must be the same. A patent cannot be amended so as to cover improvements which have come into use or been invented by others after its issue.

5. The last clause of section 53 of the Act of 1870 relates to the matter of evidence alone, and cannot enlarge the power of the commissioner in reference to the invention for which a reissue may be granted.

6. A patent cannot be reissued to enlarge the claim unless there has been a clear mistake, inadvertently committed, in the wording of the claim, and the application for a reissue is made within a reasonably short period after the original patent was granted.

7. It is a good defense in a suit on a reissued patent to show that the commissioner exceeded his authority in granting it.

8. The statement in the original specification of the object of an invention, in general terms, cannot have the effect of making the reissue one for the same invention as that of the original, when it otherwise would not be.

9. The invention described in the first eight claims of the reissued letters patent No. 10062, granted March 14, 1882, to Arthur E. Hotchkiss for improvements in clock movements, is different from that which was the subject of the original patent, and the statute in regard to reissues forbids such a radical transformation of the patent.

The facts of the case are fully stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Charles E. Mitchell and John K. Beach, for appellants:

It is conceded that expanded claims, even within the limits of the original invention, are void if the application for correction is unreasonably delayed.

That a patent for a process cannot be reissued into a patent for a composition.

That a patent for a machine cannot be reissued for a process of operating that class of machines.

James v. Campbell, 104 U. S. 356 (26: 786); Heald v. Rice, 104 U. S. 737 (26: 910); Wing v. Anthony, 106 U. S. 142 (27: 110).

That new matter cannot be introduced, such as would have the effect of changing the invention.

Giant Powder Co. v. California Powder Works, 98 U. S. 126, 138 (25: 77, 81).

Errors and inperfections may be corrected, and with that view the commissioner may allow the patentee to redescribe his invention.

Surrenders are allowed in order that what was imperfect before may be made perfect, and in order that what was before ambiguous may be made clear and certain; and, for that purpose, the patentee may add whatever was substantially suggested or indicated in the original specifications, drawings, or Patent-Office model.

If the reissued patent does not, upon the face of the instrument, embrace anything not substantially described, suggested, or indicated in the specifications, drawings, or model of the original, the defense that the reissued patent is not for the same invention as the original must be overruled.

The validity of the reissue depends upon the fact whether the patents are for the same invention, and the identity of the invention must be determined by the drawings and specifications construed together.

Searls v. Worden, 21 Off. Gaz. 1955.

Mr. C. R. Ingersoll, for appellees:

The specification of the reissued patent is almost entirely of new matter; and the reissued patent is therefore void. There is nothing of patentable novelty in the inventions claimed by the first eight claims of the reissued patent.

Mr. Justice Blatchford delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a suit in equity, brought in the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Connecticut, by the Parker and Whipple Company, a corporation of Connecticut, and Arthur E. Hotchkiss, against the Yale Clock Company, a corporation of Connecticut, and Henry C. Shelton, Frederick A. Lane, and Paschal Converse, directors of the latter Company. The suit is founded on reissued letters patent No. 10062, granted March 14, 1882, to Arthur E. Hotchkiss, for improvements in clock movements, on an application for a reissue filed July 19, 1881, the orginal patent, No. 221310, having been granted to Hotchkiss, November 4, 1879, on an application filed July 29, 1879, and a prior reissue, No. 9656, having been granted April 12, 1881.

The circuit court dismissed the bill, upon the ground that the invention described in the first eight claims of the reissue, which are the claims alleged to have been infringed, was an invention of which no trace was to be found in the original specification, and was manifestly other and different from that which was the subject of the original patent, and that the statute in regard to reissues forbids such a radical transformation of a patent as was attempted in this case. 21 Blatchf. 485. The plaintiffs have appealed to this court.

The circumstances of this case are so well stated in the opinion delivered by Judge Shipman, holding the circuit court, that we adopt his language as follows:

"At the date of the invention, expensive clocks of tiny size were being made, which met with favor from the public. They were convenient and attractive, and the main object of the patentee (the original specification says a leading object) was to make a good time keeping clock of the like small size, which could be furnished to the public at the small price which characterizes the manufacture of Connecticut clocks. The clock was devised for this end, unquestionably with much study and painstaking, and I shall assume that the invention, as claimed in the reissue, was both novel and patentable. Much skill and ingenuity have been displayed in attacking and defending these contested points, but, as I think that a vital point of the plaintiffs' case depends upon the validity of the reissue, I shall confine myself to that question.

"The patentee, in his original specification, stated the nature of his invention as follows: 'This invention relates to that class of timekeepers in which a fixed annular rack or internally toothed wheel is employed to aid a spring barrel in rotating the train of wheels. The nature of said invention consists, partly, in the combination of a fixed internally toothed circular rack and a concentric going barrel or plate with a mainspring, a transmitting wheel rotating with said barrel, and a fixed clock movement. It also consists in arranging the operating parts of the timepiece on a fixed plate, and attaching the same to the back of the clock case by means of tongues which extend out from said plate through perforations in the back of said case. It also consists in providing said tongues with broad shoulders, which cause said plate to stand out from the back of the clock case, so as to leave space for the mainspring between them. It also consists in the combination of a mainspring having a perforated end with a lateral finger extending from the broad part of one of said tongues, whereby said mainspring is firmly held at its fixed end, yet easily detached. It also consists in the combination with a fixed plate, which confines the mainspring and supports the movement, of a rotating plate arranged in front of said fixed plate, and provided with a hub which extends through said fixed plate and is connected to the winding end of the mainspring. It also consists in adapting to and combining with the hub thus constructed, a key having a screw threaded winding part for engaging with said hub, and a recessed part for engaging with the prismatic end of the centre shaft. It also consists in constructing the annular rack or internally toothed wheel with an annular recess for receiving the pillar plate, and thereby economizing space. It also consists in constructing the pillar plate and pillars in one piece, and attaching said pillars to the front plate by twisting them. It also consists in substituting an automatic winding dog, operating like an escapement verge, for the click and spring ordinarily used. It also consists in constructing the case with an opening at the bottom and adapting the key and the adjusting nut of the pendulum ball to one another, so that the adjustment of the said ball may be effected conveniently from the outside of the case. It also consists in providing said ball with a spring which will force it down into place and with a guide which will prevent it from turning.' The twelve claims of the original patent were confined to these details thus enumerated in the specification.

"In March, 1880, the Parker & Whipple Company entered into a contract with the Yale Clock Company to manufacture the Hotchkiss clock, at a stipulated price per clock, the licensees furnishing the dies and tools for such manufacture. About 50,000 clocks were made by the defendants and delivered to the licensees between June 17 and December 27, 1880. During this period the defendant Frederick A. Lane, superintendent of the Yale Clock Company, made the infringing clock. It did not contain a single patented feature of the Hotchkiss clock, but in respect to every other leading feature the parts of the two clocks are interchangeable. The Lane clock was immediately patented, was put upon the market and is being manufactured by the Yale Clock Company.

"An examination of the Hotchkiss patent showed that the vital parts of the invention were not alluded to in the specification or in the claims. Perhaps the fact that the clock had three wheels and their position might have been understood by an expert, from drawing No. 6. That drawing was not made for the purpose of showing the wheels, and it is manifest, from the specification, that the patentee did not suppose they had anything to do with his invention, which he did suppose lay entirely in other parts of the clock. The model showed a completed clock, and contained whatever was and was not invented by Hotchkiss.

"In the specification of the second reissue, the patentee omitted the entire description which has been quoted, and inserted the following: 'My invention relates to an improvement in clock movements, the object being to make a clock movement which shall be simple and durable in its construction, of small initial cost in manufacture, and the several parts of which shall be relatively arranged in such manner that the movement may be inclosed in a small and compact case. To this end, the invention consists essentially in dividing the train into two parts; in arranging the divisions of the train in a frame having three plates; in providing an additional wheel and pinion between the escape wheel and centre wheel; in making the three wheels between the escape wheel and centre wheel with the same number of teeth and of the same size; in arranging the pivots of the three arbors, carrying the three like wheels and pinions, between the escape wheel and centre wheel, in the circumferences of circles which are concentric with the centre arbor; and in other minor improvements, as the invention is hereinafter more fully described, and explained by reference to the drawings. In accordance with this statement, the plaintiffs' experts claimed, upon the trial, that the invention consisted generally in the division of the train into two parts, by means of a frame having three plates, the point of division being between the centre wheel and the centre pinion; and, secondly, in the arrangement, between the centre wheel and the escape wheel, of three wheels which are driven by the centre wheel, in the circumference of a circle which is concentric to the centre arbor, the three wheels being arranged on a semicircle concentric to the centre pinion. This general outline of the invention is stated with accuracy and completeness in eight claims of the reissue, four of which relate to the division of the train into two parts, in a frame having three plates, while the other four relate to the arrangement of the three wheels. The 10th and 11th claims relate to details which were specified in the original patent, but which are not used by the defendants. The defendants infringe the first eight claims.

"The position of the plaintiffs is that the invention of the reissue was the invention of Hotchkiss, and was shown in the model accompanying the original application for a patent, and that, therefore, the description in the reissue is not to be regarded as new matter, but as a correction of a misstatement in the description contained in the original specification.

"The defendants, making no point in regard to laches in applying for a correction of the original patent, deny the plaintiffs' premise and conclusion. They deny the premise, because they say that the original description limited the invention to that class of timekeepers in which a fixed annular rack or internally toothed wheel is employed to aid a spring-barrel in rotating the train of wheels, and that this construction only was shown in the model, and that the importance of the Lane invention consisted in the abandonment of the 'planet wheel' and the substitution therefor of the ordinary mainspring.

"If the premise was true, they deny the conclusion, because it is a fact, the truth of which is apparent, that, in the original specification and drawings, the patentee gave no hint that he regarded the construction described in any one of the first eight claims of the reissue as forming any material or immaterial part of his invention."

On these premises, the court said that "the eight claims which are in controversy are a total abandonment of the principles which are stated in the original patent to be those of the invention, and are an introduction into the reissue of a subject matter which has no relation to the original patent, except that each patent relates to clocks."

The original patent contained twelve claims, in these words:

"1. In combination with a fixed circular rack and a stationary clock movement, a plate rotated by the mainspring and carrying a device which connects the rack and movement, substantially as and for the purpose set forth.

"2. A perforated clock case back, in combination with a base plate for the movement, said base plate being provided with flexible claws, which may pass through the perforations in said clock case back, substantially as and for the purpose set forth.

"3. In combination with mainspring B, perforated at b, the lateral attaching finger c on flange C' of plate C, said parts being constructed and applied substantially as and for the purpose set forth.

"4. In combination with mainspring B, the fixed plate C and its flanges, C', forming a barrel for said spring, but allowing inspection of the latter between the flanges C', substantially as set forth.

"5. In combination with mainspring B and fixed plate C, the rotating plate F and its hub G, said hub extending through plate C for the attachment of the spring, substantially as set forth.

"6. In combination with ratchet V, a verge like automatic winding dog U, held in proper position for catching by the forward motion of said ratchet.

"7. In combination with a pillar plate, a fixed circular rack having an annular inner recess to receive said plate, whereby said rack serves also the purpose of attaching said plate, and the said parts are made to occupy the least possible space.

"8. In combination with a perforated front plate a rear pillar plate, having twisted tongues on the ends of its pillars, whereby said plates and pillars are clamped together, substantially as set forth.

"9. In combination with a pendulum rod and adjustable pendulum ball, a spring arranged to force said ball down against the adjusting nut.

"10. In combination with a pendulum rod and an adjustable pendulum ball, a spring fitted into a recess of said ball and operating to force the latter down against the said nut.

"11. In combination with the adjusting nut of a pendulum, a clock case bottom, perforated at A^2, and a key having a prismatic recess fitting said nut, whereby the height of the pendulum ball may be adjusted by the key from the outside of the clock case, substantially as set forth.

"12. In combination with a hollow internally threaded winding hub, G, a key having a screw threaded portion for engaging with said hub, and a prismatically recessed portion for passing through said hub and engaging with the center shaft."

The reissue contains ten claims, as follows:

"1. In a clock movement having a frame consisting of three plates suitably connected together, a train which is divided into two parts, a front part and a back part, the front part arranged between the front and middle plates of the frame, and the back part arranged between the middle and back plates of the frame, the point of division being between the centre wheel and centre pinion, the said centre wheel and centre pinion being arranged on the centre arbor carrying the minute hand, as set forth.

"2. In a clock movement having a frame consisting of three plates suitably connected together, the middle plate of the frame, the said middle plate dividing the train into two parts between the centre wheel and centre pinion, the said centre wheel and centre pinion being arranged on the centre arbor carrying the minute hand, as set forth.

"8. In a clock movement, a frame consisting of three plates suitably connected together, the middle plate of which divides the train into two parts between the centre wheel and centre pinion, the said centre wheel and centre pinion being arranged on the centre arbor carrying the minute hand, and the frame having the parts of the divided train arranged between its three plates, as set forth.

"4. In a clock movement having a frame consisting of three plates suitably connected together, a centre arbor carrying the minute hand and provided with a centre wheel and centre pinion, the wheel arranged between the front and middle plates of the frame, and the pinion arranged between the middle and back plates of the frame, as set forth.

"5. The improvement in a clock train, consisting of three wheels suitably fastened on arbors carrying pinions, and arranged between the escape wheel and its arbor carrying a pinion, and the centre arbor carrying the centre wheel and centre pinion, as set forth.

"6. The improvement in a clock train, consisting of three wheels having the same number of teeth, and the same diameters, suitably fastened on arbors, the pivots of which are arranged in the circumferences of circles concentric with the centre arbor, the several arbors carrying pinions having the same number of leaves and the same diameters, all the said parts arranged between the escape wheel and its arbor carrying a pinion, and the centre arbor carrying the centre wheel and centre pinion, as set forth.

"7. The improvement in a clock train, consisting in the arrangement of the pivots of the escape wheel arbor and of the pivots of the three arbors carrying the three wheels and the three pinions between the escape wheel arbor and the centre arbor carrying the centre wheel and centre pinion, in a semicircle, as set forth.

"8. In a clock movement, the combination, with a train divided into two parts, a front part and a back part, by the middle plate of a frame having three plates, the division being made between the centre wheel and centre pinion, the said centre wheel and centre pinion being arranged on the centre arbor carrying the minute hand, the escape wheel being arranged in the front part of the train and near the top of the frame, and the pivots of the front part of the train being arranged within a semicircle, of a pendulum attached to an arbor near the top of the frame and vibrating in a plane passing between the front and middle plates of the frame, as set forth.

"9. In a clock movement provided with a circular rack, the circular disk F, rotated by the mainspring and carrying the planet wheel E only, which connects the rack with the centre pinion as set forth.

"10. In combination with a pendulum rod provided with the plate S, fastened to the rod, a spring arranged on the rod, to hold the pendulum ball against the adjusting nut, as set forth."

The appellants contend that the first eight claims of the reissue do not specify any invention which is not contained in the clock described in the original patent and embodied in the model originally deposited in the Patent Office, and that the drawings of the original and of the reissued patent are substantially the same. On these premises it is argued for the appellants, that it is lawful to include in the claims of a reissue whatever is suggested, or substantially indicated, in the specification, model or drawings of the original patent, if the applicant was the original and first inventor thereof, and that such a reissue will, therefore, be for the same invention as that of the original patent.

Expressions in some opinions of this court, wrested from their context and interpreted in a different sense from that in which they were used, are cited to support these views; but the language of the court on the subject has steadily been to the contrary, and, as the question arises so distinctly in this case, and some misapprehension exists in regard to it, it seems proper to discuss it with some fullness.

The first statutory provision for the reissue of patents was made by the 3d section of the Act of July 8, 1832, chap. 162, 4 Stat. at L. 559. It provided for the reissue in certain cases "for the same invention." This provision of the Act of 1832 was superseded by section 13 of the Act of July 4, 1836, chap. 357, 5 Stat. at L. 122, which provided "that whenever any patent which has heretofore been granted, or which shall hereafter be granted, shall be inoperative, or invalid, by reason of a defective or insufficient description or specification, or by reason of the patentee claiming in his specification, as his own invention, more than he had or shall have a right to claim as new; if the error has, or shall have, arisen by inadvertency, accident, or mistake, and without any fraudulent or deceptive intention, it shall be lawful for the commissioner, upon the surrender to him of such patent, and the payment of the further duty of fifteen dollars, to cause a new patent to be issued to the said inventor, for the same invention."

This provision of the Act of 1836 was in turn superseded by section 53 of the Act of July 8, 1870, chap. 230, 16 Stat. at L. 205, which provided "that whenever any patent is inoperative or invalid, by reason of a defective or insufficient specification, or by reason of the patentee claiming as his own invention or discovery more than he had a right to claim as new, if the error has arisen by inadvertence, accident, or mistake, and without any fraudulent or deceptive intention, the commissioner shall, on the surrender of such patent and the payment of the duty required by law, cause a new patent for the same invention, and in accordance with the corrected specification, to be issued to the patentee." This provision of the Act of 1870 was enacted in the same language in section 4916 of the Revised Statutes, and was the provision of law in force when the reissue in the present case was granted.

It is thus seen that in all the statutes on the subject of reissues, the only authority granted to the commissioner is one to issue a new patent "for the same invention."

The provision of the Statute of 1836 has been before this court in numerous cases. In Burr v. Duryee, 68 U.S. 1 Wall. 531, 577 [17:650, 660], at December Term, 1863, this court, speaking by Mr. Justice Grier, said: "The surrender of valid patents, and the granting of reissued patents thereon, with expanded or equivocal claims, where the original was clearly neither 'inoperative nor invalid,' and whose specification is neither 'defective or insufficient,' is a great abuse of the privilege granted by the statute, and productive of great injury to the public. This privilege was not given to the patentee or his assignee in order that the patent may be rendered more elastic or expansive, and therefore more 'available' for the suppression of all other inventions."

The case of Seymour v. Osborne, 78 U. S. 11 Wall. 516 [20:83], was before this court at December Term, 1870. The answer set up, as a defense, that the reissued patents sued on were void, because not granted for the same invention as that embodied in the original patents. The court overruled the defense on the ground stated by it, p. 546 [39], that the original patents were not in evidence in the case. Notwithstanding this, the opinion, delivered by Mr. Justice Clifford, said: "Reissued letters patent must, by the express words of the section authorizing the same, be for the same invention, and consequently where it appears on a comparison of the two instruments, as matter of law, that the reissued patent is not for the same invention as that embraced and secured in the original patent, the reissued patent is invalid, as that state of facts shows that the commissioner, in granting the new patent, exceeded his jurisdiction. Power is unquestionably conferred upon the commissioner to allow the specification to be amended if the patent is inoperative or invalid, and in that event to issue the patent in proper form; and he may, doubtless, under that authority, allow the patentee to redescribe his invention and to include in the description and claims of the patent not only what was well described before, but whatever else was suggested or substantially indicated in the specification or drawings which properly belonged to the invention as actually made and perfected. Interpolations of new features, ingredients, or devices, which were neither described, suggested, nor indicated in the original patent, or patent office model, are not allowed, as it is clear that the commissioner has no jurisdiction to grant a reissue unless it be for the same invention as that embodied in the original letters patent, which necessarily excludes the right on such an application to open the case to new parol testimony and a new hearing as to the nature and extent of the improvement, except in certain special cases, as provided by a recent enactment not applicable to the case before the court. Corrections may be made in the description, specification, or claim where the patentee has claimed as new more than he had a right to claim, or where the description, specification, or claim is defective or insufficient, but he cannot under such an application make material additions to the invention which were not described, suggested, nor substantially indicated in the original specifications, drawings, or patent office model. * * * Letters patent reissued for an invention substantially different from that embodied in the original patent are void and of no effect, as no jurisdiction to grant such a patent is conferred by any Act of Congress upon the commissioner, and he possesses no power in that behalf except what the Acts of Congress confer. Whether a reissued patent is for the same invention as that embodied in the original patent, or for a different one, is a question for the court in an equity suit to be determined as a matter of construction, on a comparison of the two instruments, aided or not by the testimony of expert witnesses, as it may or may not appear that one or both may contain technical terms or terms of art requiring such assistance in ascertaining the true meaning of the language employed."

In these extracts from the opinion it is seen that the court adheres strictly to the view, that, under the statute, the commissioner has no jurisdiction to grant a reissued patent for an invention substantially different from that embodied in the original patent, and that a reissue granted not in accordance with that rule is void. In what is there said about redescribing the invention, and about including in the new description and new claims what was suggested or indicated in the original specification, drawings or patent office model, it is clearly to be understood, from the entire language, that the things so to be included are only the things which properly belonged to the invention as embodied in the original patent; that what that invention was is to be ascertained by consulting the original patent; and that, while the new description may properly contain things which are indicated in the original specification, drawings or patent office model (though not sufficiently described in the original specification), it does not follow that what was indicated in the original specification, drawings or patent office model is to be considered as a part of the invention, unless the court can see, from a comparison of the two patents, that the original patent embodied, as the invention intended to be secured by it, what the claims of the reissue are intended to cover.

In what was thus said in Seymour v. Osborne there is no warrant for the view, that, ex vi termini, what was suggested or indicated in the original specification, drawings or patent office model is to be considered as a part of the invention intended to have been covered by the original patent, unless the court can see, from a comparison of the two patents, that the invention which the original patent was intended to cover fairly embraced the things thus suggested or indicated in the original specification, drawings or patent office model, and unless the original specification indicated that those things were embraced in the invention intended to have been secured by the original patent.

The "recent enactment" referred to in Seymour v. Osborne is found in section 53 of the Act of July 8, 1870, in these words: "But no new matter shall be introduced into the specification, nor in case of a machine patent shall the model or drawings be amended, except each by the other; but when there is neither model nor drawing, amendments may be made upon proof satisfactory to the commissioner that such new matter or amendment was a part of the original invention, and was omitted from the specification by inadvertence, accident, or mistake, as aforesaid." This provision is now found in the same words, in section 4916 of the Revised Statutes. The last clause of it has no application to the present case, and, therefore, its proper construction need not be considered.

The case of Gill v. Wells, 89 U. S. 22 Wall. 1 [22:699], at October Term, 1874, arose under the Act of 1836. In that case, this court, speaking by Mr. Justice Clifford, said. p. 19 [708]: "Invalid and inoperative patents may be surrendered and reissued for the same invention, but Congress never intended that a patent which was valid and operative should be reissued merely to afford the patentee an opportunity to expand the exclusive privileges which it secures, to enable him to suppress subsequent improvements which do not conflict with the invention described in the surrendered patent. Evidence of a decisive character to negative the theory that such a practice finds any support in the Act of Congress, besides what existed before, is found in the new Patent Act," the Act of July 8, 1870, section 53, "which expressly provides that no new matter shall be introduced into the specification; and in case of a machine patent, that neither the model nor the drawings shall be amended except each by the other."

In the case of Giant Powder Co. v. California Powder Works, 98 U. S. 126 [25:77], at October Term, 1878, this court, speaking by Mr. Justice Bradley, said, p. 137 [81], in reference to the reissued patents in that case: "These reissues, being granted in 1872, were subject to the law as it then stood, being the Act of July 8, 1870, the fifty-third section of which (reproduced in section 4916 of the Revised Statutes) relates to the matter in question. It seems to us impossible to read this section carefully without coming to the conclusion that a reissue can only be granted for the same invention which formed the subject of the original patent of which it is a reissue. The express words of the Act are 'a new patent for the same invention;' and these words are copied from the Act of 1836, which in this respect was substantially the same as the Act of 1870. The specification may be amended so as to make it more clear and distinct; the claim may be modified so as to make it more conformable to the exact rights of the patentee; but the invention must be the same. So particular is the law on this subject, that it is declared that 'no new matter shall be introduced into the specification.' This prohibition is general, relating to all patents; and by 'new matter' we supposed to be meant new substantive matter, such as would have the effect of changing the invention, or of introducing what might be the subject of another application for a patent. The danger to be provided against was the temptation to amend a patent so as to cover improvements which might have come into use, or might have been invented by others, after its issue. The Legislature was willing to concede to the patentee the right to amend the specification so as fully to describe and claim the very invention attempted to be secured by his original patent, and which was not fully secured thereby, in consequence of inadvertence, accident, or mistake; but was not willing to give him the right to patch up his patent by the addition of other inventions, which, though they might be his, had not been applied for by him, or, if applied for, had been abandoned or waived. For such inventions he is required to make a new application, subject to such rights as the public and other inventors may have acquired in the mean time. This, we think, is what the present statute means, and what, indeed, was the law before its enactment under the previous Act of 1836. If decisions can be found which present it in any different aspect, we cannot admit them to be correct expositions of the law. The counsel for the complainant refers us to and places special reliance on the last clause of section 53 of the Act of 1870, where it is said: 'But where there is neither model nor drawing, amendments may be made upon proof satisfactory to the commissioner that such new matter or amendment was a part of the original invention, and was omitted from the specification by inadvertence, accident, or mistake.' But this clause relates only to the evidence which may be employed by the commissioner in ascertaining the defects of the specification. It does not authorize him to grant a reissue for a different invention, or to determine that one invention is the same as another and different one, or that two inventions essentially distinct constitute but one. In this case, it is not necessary for us to decide, and we express no opinion as to the precise meaning and extent of the final clause of section 53, to which we have referred; as, whether it relates to all patents, or only to patents for machines. But as it relates to the matter of evidence alone it cannot enlarge the power of the commissioner in reference to the invention for which a reissue may be granted. That power is restricted, by the general terms of the section, to the same invention which was originally patented."

If, by "new matter," in section 4916 of the Revised Statutes, is meant such new substantive matter as might be the subject of another application for a patent, there was new substantive matter introduced into the specification of the reissue in the present case; for the description set forth in that specification as the foundation for the first eight claims in it, and those eight claims themselves, might have been the subject of another application for a patent at the time the original patent was applied for and taken out, leaving that patent valid and operative in respect to the claims it covered.

In the present case, the infringing clock was made by the defendant Lane more than six months before the reissue in suit was applied for. As stated by the circuit court in its opinion in this case, the Lane clock did not contain a single patented feature of the Hotchkiss clock, and it was immediately patented and put upon the market. This, therefore, is a case of the amendment of a patent so as to cover improvements not covered by the patent, and which came into use by others than the patentee and his licensee, free from the protection of the patent.

There is no evidence of any attempt to secure by the original patent the inventions covered by the first eight claims of the reissue, and those inventions must be regarded as having been abandoned or waived, so far as the reissue in question is concerned, subject, however, to the right to have made a new application for a patent to cover them; in other words those eight claims are not for the same invention which was originally patented.

In Mahn v. Harwood, 112 U. S. 354, 359 [28:665, 667], at October Term, 1884, it was said by this court, speaking by Mr. Justice Bradley: "In this very matter of reissued patents, it has also been frequently decided that it is a good defense, in a suit on such a patent, to show that the commissioner exceeded his authority in granting it. Such a defense is established by showing that the reissued patent is for a different invention from that described in the original, inasmuch as the statute declares that it must be for the same invention."

The same view was taken in Coon v. Wilson, 113 U. S. 268, 277 [28: 963, 965], at October Term, 1884, a case substantially like the present one, where it was said: "Although this reissue was applied for a little over three months after the original patent was granted, the case is one where it is sought merely to enlarge the claim of the original patent, by repeating that claim and adding others; where no mistake or inadvertence is show, so far as the short or sectional bands are concerned; where the patentee waited until the defendants produced their continuous band collar, and then applied for such enlarged claims as to embrace the defendants' collar, which was not covered by the claim of the original patent; and where it is apparent, from a comparison of the two patents, that the reissue was made to enlarge the scope of the original. As the rule is expressed in the recent case of Mahn v. Harwood [supra], a patent 'cannot be lawfully reissued for the mere purpose of enlarging the claim, unless there has been a clear mistake, inadvertently committed, in the wording of the claim and the application for a reissue is made within a reasonably short period after the original patent was granted.' But a clear mistake, inadvertently committed in the wording of the claim is necessary, without reference to the length of time. In the present case, there was no mistake in the wording of the claim of the original patent. The description warranted no other claim. It did not warrant any claim covering bands not short or sectional. The description had to be changed in the reissue, to warrant the new claims in the reissue. The description in the reissue is not a more clear and satisfactory statement of what is described in the original patent, but is a description of a different thing, so ingeniously worded as to cover collars with continuous long bands and which have no short or sectional bands." See also Ives v. Sargent, 119 U. S. 652, 662, 663 [30: 544, 548].

Reference was made on the argument to language used by Mr. Justice Bradley, in delivering the opinion of this court in the case of the Corn-planter Patent, 90 U. S. 23 Wall. 181, 217 [23: 161, 168], where he said: "It may be remarked in passing, that, in our view, the several reissues are for things contained within the machines and apparatus described in the original patents." The reissues referred to were sustained by this court. There is nothing in the remark thus made to show that the court did not find the reissues to be for the same inventions as the original patents, consistently with the views contained in the other cases above referred to, or that the court did not follow those views in deciding that case.

Comment is made by the appellants upon the fact that the original specification states that the "mainspring occupies the whole back of the space occupied by the works, so as to give the greatest running power with the least possible expense of room, one of the leading objects of my invention being to render it possible to make a cheap, neat, and satisfactory timepiece of unusually small size;" and upon the further fact that the specification of the reissue states that the invention has for its object "to make a clock movement which shall be simple and durable in its construction, of small initial cost in manufacture, and the several parts of which shall be relatively arranged in such manner that the movement may be inclosed in a small and compact case." It is urged that every one of the claims of the reissue responds to the object of making a cheap and small but satisfactory timepiece. But this statement, in the original specification, of the object of the invention, in such general terms, cannot have the effect of making the reissue one for the same invention as that of the original, when it otherwise would not be. Such a general statement contained no intimation that the invention consisted in the matters covered by the first eight claims of the reissue.

The decree of the Circuit Court is affirmed.

WILLIAM J. FLAGG.

Patent for land—excessive surveys—Act of May 20, 1826—cession to State of Ohio—military tract—Virginia warrants—Ohio Agricultural and Mechanical College—letters as evidence.

1. The second section of the Act of July 7, 1838, 5 Stat. at L. 302, forbids the issuing of a patent upon a survey calling for a greater quantity of land than the party is entitled to by virtue of the warrant; and in such case, it being the duty of the department to refuse the patent, the right of the applicant is merely to withdraw his survey, and resurvey his location, excluding such surplus quantity.

2. The proviso in the Act of March 23, 1807, 4 Stat. at L. 92, cannot have the effect of establishing excessive surveys, whether by mistake or design, as binding on the government so as to vest an equitable estate in the holder of the warrant, and entitle him to a patent for the whole or a part of the survey.

3. The second section of the Act of May 20, 1826, 4 Stat. at L. 189, is limited in its operation to cases provided for by the preceding section and therefore ceased to operate after the dates therein mentioned.

4. The meaning of the Act of Feb. 18, 1871, seems to be to grant to the State of Ohio all the lands in the Virginia military district which had not, at that time, been legally surveyed and sold by the United States, in that sense of the word which conveys the idea of having parted with a beneficial title.

5. At the date of the Act of Feb. 18, 1871, the time within which it was competent to appropriate any of the lands to the satisfaction of warrants issued by the State of Virginia had expired. The trust had been satisfied and may be regarded as having been extinguished.

6. The fourth section of the Act of May 27, 1880, has the legal operation and effect of confirming and ratifying previous titles made by the Ohio Agricultural and Mechanical College, under the Act of Feb. 18, 1871.

7. It was essential to the vesting of any interest under an entry and survey within the Virginia military land district, made prior to January 1, 1852, that the survey should be returned to the Commissioner of the General Land-Office at Washington on or before that date; the failure to do so discharged the land from any claim founded on such location and survey.

8. Copies of official letters written by the Commissioner of the General Land-Office, sworn to by a witness who was a clerk in such office and acquainted with the facts, are evidence of his decisions, when written by him to the parties interested.

Reported below, 38 Ohio St. 156.

Messrs. Charles King, Wm. B. King, A. C. Thompson and N. W. Evans, for plaintiff in error:

Under the proviso of 1807 a survey once made, no matter how informal, appropriated the land located and withdrew it from subsequent location.

A surplus does not vitiate a survey.

Either the title passed under the cession of February 18, 1871, or it is still in the United States, in trust for the owner of the survey.

If it be admitted that the cession of February, 1871, conveyed this land to the State of Ohio, and with the decision of the commissioner was equivalent to a patent, yet the equities of the owner of the survey can be asserted and protected.

Messrs. W. A. Hutchins and George O. Newman, for defendants in error:

Where both the entry and survey had been made prior to January 1, 1852, the failure to make return of the survey to the General Land-Office before that date would discharge the land from any claim founded on such location and survey and extinguish all rights acquired thereby.

Fussell v. Gregg, 113 U. S. 550–566 (28:993, 999).

If there had been no entry or survey, or if the entry and survey, or either of them, were defective, or were void, but the government had issued its patent granting the land, the title would pass, and the land could be treated in the broad sense as "sold" land.

The subsequent entry and survey is declared null and void, because Congress saw proper, having the power to do so, to so declare; second, because land already surveyed or patented is no longer land subject to entry and survey, and third, because the subsequent entry and survey of land already surveyed or patented is expressly prohibited.

Jackson v. Clark, 26 U. S. 1 Pet. 628 (7:294); Price v. Johnston, 1 Ohio St. 394; Stubblefield v. Boggs, and Thomas v. White, supra.

If the patent has been issued irregularly, the government may provide means for repealing it.

Miller v Kerr, 20 U. S. 7 Wheat. 1 (5:381); Thomas v. White, 2 Ohio St. 549.

Mr. Justice Matthews delivered the opinion of the court.

The judgment sought to be reviewed on the present writ of error was rendered by the Supreme Court of the State of Ohio in a proceeding begun by Flagg, the defendant in error, to quiet his title and possession to a certain tract of land lying in Nile Township, Scioto County, Ohio, within the Virginia military district, embraced within survey No. 15882. The judgment of the Supreme Court of Ohio in the case is reported as Coan v. Flagg, 38 Ohio St. 156.

On the 18th of February, 1871, Congress passed an Act to cede to the State of Ohio the unsurveyed and unsold land in the Virginia military district in said State, 16 Stat. at L. 416, which reads as follows:

"Be it enacted by the Senate and the House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the lands remaining unsurveyed and unsold in the Virginia military district in the State of Ohio be, and the same are hereby, ceded to the State of Ohio, upon the conditions following, to wit: Any person who at the time of the passage of this Act is a bona fide settler on any portion of said land may hold not exceeding one hundred and sixty acres, so by him occupied, by his pre-empting the same in such manner as the Legislature of the State of Ohio may direct."

The lands thus ceded were granted by the State of Ohio to the Ohio Agricultural and Mechanical College. The college claiming the lands in controversy to be embraced within this cession, for a valuable consideration sold and conveyed the same to Flagg, who entered into possession prior to the commencement of this suit. Coan, the original defendant, claims title under:

1. Exchange military warrant No. 494, issued by the State of Virginia on the 16th day of June, 1840, to the children and heirs of Francis Gordon, a child and heir of John Gordon, the only heir of Thomas Gordon, who was a lieutenant of cavalry in the Continental line of Virginia troops in the Revolutionary War, for 500 acres of land to be laid off in one or more surveys;

2. An entry No. 15882, purporting to cover 500 acres of land under the foregoing warrant No. 494, made on December 18, 1849, by the said heirs of Francis Gordon and one David F. Heaton, an assignee of part of said warrant;

3. A survey under said entry No. 15882, purporting to contain 400 acres, 875 acres for the heirs of Francis Gordon, and 25 acres for said Heaton, made by said D. F. Heaton, a deputy surveyor of the district, on April 10, 1851, giving the metes and bounds of the land surveyed, which was duly recorded on December 26, 1851, in the district land-office at Chillicothe;

4. And mesne conveyances from the heirs of said Francis Gordon and said Heaton to Coan.

It is an undisputed fact, appearing on the record, that this survey No. 15882 embraces in fact 1682 acres.

The answer of Coan, the defendant below, contains the averment that "on the 26th of December, A. D. 1851, the said E. P. Kendrick, surveyor for said district, duly certified said survey, being numbered (the same as said entry) 15882, to the General Land-Office at Washington, D. C., for patent, and that said survey has ever since been on file in said office."

It is stated, however, in a letter addressed by the acting Commissioner of the General Land-Office to L. C. Heaton, the executor of David F. Heaton, then claiming title, dated June 18, 1878, and admitted in evidence, that survey No. 15882 was filed in that office for the purpose of obtaining a patent on the 26th of April, 1852. The same fact is recited in a letter from Willis Drummond, the Commissioner of the General Land-Office, dated October 26, 1871, also admitted in evidence, addressed to David F. Heaton, then claiming title. No patent has ever been issued on this entry and survey, for the reason, among others, given in the correspondence between the officers of the land department and Heaton, "that the same contained a large excess of land over and above the amount stated therein and actually due in virtue of said warrant exchange No. 494;" the amount of that excess being stated at 1282 acres. This was communicated in a letter from the Commissioner of the General Land-Office to L. C. Heaton, dated June 18, 1878, in which it was said that: "This office will not, of course, recognize the validity of any such survey as the foregoing, and must refuse, if there were no other objections, to carry the same into grant, and unless you deny the facts as above stated and wish to offer rebutting testimony, and be heard in reply, you will understand that the claim for patent in the case of said survey No. 15882 is rejected. Should you, however, dispute the correctness of the said resurvey, etc., and will at once advise this office of the fact, every reasonable opportunity will be afforded you to be heard in the case with such evidence as you may desire to present."

On July 11, 1878, the Commissioner of the General Land-Office, by a letter of that date, addressed to L. C. Heaton, informed him, in response to his application made in a letter of June 30, that ninety days from July 11th would be allowed to establish his claim to a patent upon this survey.

On October 10, 1878, the commissioner wrote to Heaton a letter containing the following: "You were advised on the 18th of June last of the rejection of your application for a patent in the case, but, at your request of the 30th of the same month, the matter was held open for the period above stated to afford you an opportunity to present rebutting testimony, etc. The allotted time having expired and nothing presented on your part to sustain the validity of the said survey, you are hereby advised that the rejection of the case, as stated in my said communication of the 18th June last, is now made definite and final, so far as this office is concerned." No further action was taken in the department on the subject.

It also appears that for the 100 acres not embraced in this survey, to make the 500 acres called for by warrant No. 494, another survey was made containing $517\frac{44}{100}$ acres, so that the whole amount of land embraced in the two surveys upon that warrant, nominally for 500 acres, actually embraced an excess of $1699\frac{44}{100}$ acres.

On the 27th of May, 1880, Congress passed an Act to construe and define the Act of February 18, 1871. The first and second sections of this Act are as follows:

"Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Act ceding to the State of Ohio the lands remaining unsurveyed and unsold in the Virginia military district in the State of Ohio had no reference to lands which were included in any survey or entry within said district founded upon military warrant or warrants upon continental establishment; and the true intent and meaning of said Act was to cede to the State of Ohio only such lands as were unappropriated and not included in any survey or entry within said district, which survey or entry was founded upon military warrant or warrants upon continental establishment.

"Sec. 2. That all legal surveys returned to the land-office on or before March third, eighteen hundred and fifty-seven, on entries made on or before January first, eighteen hundred and fifty-two, and founded upon unsatisfied Virginia military continental warrants, are hereby declared valid."

The fourth section is as follows:

"Sec. 4. This Act shall not in any way affect or interfere with the title to any lands sold for a valuable consideration by the Ohio Agricultural and Mechanical College, grantee, under the Act of February eighteenth, eighteen hundred and seventy-one." 21 Stat. at L. 142.

On the 7th of August, 1882, Congress passed an Act in relation to land titles in the Virginia military district of Ohio, as follows:

"Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That any person in the actual, open possession of any tract of land in the Virginia military district of the State of Ohio, under claim and color of title, made in good faith, based upon or deducible from any entry to any tract of land within said district founded upon military warrant upon continental establishment, and a record of which entry was duly made in the office of the principal surveyor of the Virginia military district, either before or since its removal to Chillicothe, Ohio, prior to January first, eighteen hundred and fifty-two, such possession having continued for twenty years last past under a claim of title on the part of said party, either as entry man, or of his or her grantors, or of parties by or under whom said party claims by purchase or inheritance, and they by title based upon or deducible from such entry by tax sale or otherwise, shall be deemed and held to be the legal owner of such land so included in such entry to the extent and according to the purport of said entry, or of his or her paper titles based thereon or deducible therefrom.

"Sec. 2. That so much of the Act approved February eighteenth, eighteen hundred and seventy-one, entitled 'An Act to Cede to the State of Ohio the Unsold Lands in the Virginia Military District in Said State,' and of an Act approved May twenty-seventh, eighteen hundred and eighty, construing said Act of February eighteenth, eighteen hundred and seventy-one, as conflicts with this Act, be, and the same is hereby, repealed." 22 Stat. at L. 348.

The Supreme Court of Ohio, in sustaining Flagg's title, decided:

1. That the entry and survey under which Coan claimed title did not invest the owners of the warrant, or their assignee, with an equitable interest in the lands surveyed as against the United States, for the reason that the excess of land surveyed beyond that covered by the warrant was so great as to make the survey fraudulent and void, and that consequently it was competent for Congress, at the date of the Act of February 18, 1871, to grant the lands at its pleasure.

2. That, without deciding the question whether the lands were granted to the Ohio Agricultural and Mechanical College by the terms of the Act of February 18, 1871, the fourth section of the Act of May 27, 1880, recognizes and ratifies Flagg's title as a purchaser from the Ohio Agricultural and Mechanical College for a valuable consideration.

These conclusions are contested by the plaintiff in error. In support of his contention, in regard to the first proposition, it is argued that a survey cannot be deemed void and of no effect merely on the ground of an excess beyond the amount called for in the warrant, because a different effect is required to be given to it by the provisions of the Act of Congress of July 7, 1838, 5 Stat. at L. 262, the second section of which declares that; "No patent shall be issued by virtue of the preceding section for a greater quantity of land than the rank or term of service of the officer or soldier, to whom or to whose heirs or assigns such warrant has been granted, would have entitled him to under the laws of Virginia and of the United States regulating the issuing of such warrants; and whenever it appears to the Secretary of War that the survey made by any of the aforesaid warrants is for a greater quantity of land than the officer or soldier is entitled to for his services, the Secretary of War shall certify on each survey the amount of such surplus quantity, and the officer or soldier, his heirs or assigns, shall have leave to withdraw his survey from the office of the Secretary of War and resurvey his location, excluding such surplus quantity in one body from any part of his resurvey, and a patent shall issue upon such resurvey as in other cases," etc.

We agree, however, with the Supreme Court of Ohio in holding that this provision of the law does not meet the difficulty. Whatever application the section may have, according to its terms, it is expressly limited to cases arising under the preceding section of the Act, which expired by its own limitation on the 10th of August, 1840, and although extended and revived by the first section of the Act of August 19, 1841, 5 Stat. at L. 449, it contained the sole authority for making and returning entries and surveys under Virginia military land warrants, and ceased for that purpose to have any operation on the 3d of March, 1857, by force of the Act of March 3, 1855, 10 Stat. at L. 701. So that the right to relief against excessive surveys granted by the second section of the Act of July 7, 1838, has not, at all events, existed since 1857. In addition, it is manifest that the second section of the Act of July 7, 1838, relied on, does condemn and forbid the issuing of a patent upon a survey calling for a greater quantity of land than the party is entitled to by virtue of the warrant; and in such cases, it being the duty of the department to refuse the patent, the right of the applicant is merely to withdraw his survey, and resurvey his location, excluding such surplus quantity. In the present instance, the patent was refused, and for that reason; but the applicant did not ask leave to withdraw his survey and cause a resurvey of the location, and so elected not to avail himself, if he had such right, of the provisions of this section.

It was further contended, however, upon this point, that Congress has recognized the validity of surveys within the district, notwithstanding the quantity embraced in them was excessive, by the proviso in the Act of March 26, 1807, 4 Stat. at L. 92, which reads as follows: "Provided, That no locations as aforesaid within the above mentioned tract shall, after the passage of this Act, be made on tracts of land for which patents had previously issued, or which had been previously surveyed; and any patent which may nevertheless be obtained for land located contrary to the provisions of this section shall be considered as null and void."

But it was rightly considered, as we think, by the Supreme Court of Ohio, that the effect of this proviso, which, it was admitted, had been continued in force by subsequent enactments, was merely to withdraw, from subsequent entry and survey, lands actually surveyed, until the previous survey should be withdrawn or set aside, as between locators seeking to appropriate the same tract, and that it cannot have the effect of establishing excessive surveys, whether by mistake or design, as binding upon the government so as to vest an equitable estate in the holder of the warrant, and entitle him to a patent for the whole or a part of the survey.

Counsel for the plaintiff in error, however, claim in argument that the Supreme Court of Ohio erred upon this point in consequence of having overlooked the second section of the Act of May 20, 1826, 4 Stat. at L. 189. This section, however, as far as it goes, is identical with the second section of the Act of July 7, 1838, above quoted, which is a re-enactment of it, the Act of May 20, 1826, having expired by its own limitation. The first section of this Act extends the time for obtaining warrants until June 1, 1829, to complete locations thereon until June 1, 1832, and to return surveys and warrants to the Commissioner of the General Land-Office, in order to obtain patents thereon, until June 1, 1833, and the second section is limited in its operation to cases provided for by the preceding section, and, therefore ceased to operate after the dates therein mentioned.

Counsel for the plaintiff in error also refer to the decisions of this court in Taylor v. Brown, 9 U. S. 5 Cranch, 249 [3:92], and Holmes v. Trout, 32 U. S. 7 Pet. 171 [8:660], as supporting the propcsition that surplus land will not vitiate a survey; but those cases applied that principle only as between prior and subsequent locators, and do not sustain the proposition that upon such a survey the applicant is entitled, as of right, to obtain a patent from the United States.

The next question is, whether the Act of February 18, 1871, taken in connection with the Act of May 27, 1880, had the effect of vesting a complete legal and equitable title to these lands in Flagg. It is argued that the lands in question were not embraced within the terms of the cession to the State of Ohio used in the Act of February 18, 1871. The lands ceded to the State by virtue of that Act are described as those "remaining unsurveyed and unsold in the Virginia military district in the State of Ohio." The word "unsold," as used in the Act, it is claimed, and may be admitted to be, entirely inappropriate. No land within that district had ever been sold, in the literal sense of that word, nor was it subject to sale. It was held in trust by the United States, first, for the purpose of satisfying donations made by the State of Virginia to her officers and soldiers in the Revolutionary War, to whom warrants might be issued as a reward for services. The remainder, after the satisfaction of those bounties, was held by the United States for their own use. All of this military tract, therefore, not appropriated according to law to the first of these uses, belonged to the United States, to be disposed of in its discretion. It was competent for Congress to grant to the State of Ohio any of these lands not subject to the trust, and at the date of the Act of February 18, 1871, the time within which it was competent to appropriate any of the lands to the satisfaction of warrants issued by the State of Virginia had expired. The trust had been satisfied, and may be regarded as having been extinguished. Whatever of these lands, therefore, remained at that time, which had not been appropriated in accordance with the terms of existing law, so as to secure to the claimant a legal right to call for a patent, was subject to the disposal of the United States for its own use and according to its own pleasure. It is in view of this condition of things that the cession contained in the Act of February 18, 1871, must be considered and construed.

It is contended in argument by the plaintiff in error that the lands embraced and conveyed by the cession contained in the Act of February 18, 1871, and therein described as "unsurveyed and unsold," must be understood to mean those which had not at that time been appropriated under existing laws so as to prevent subsequent locations by other entries and surveys upon Virginia military land warrants. And as such appropriation was then forbidden, as respects subsequent locators, by existing laws, wherever the land had been actually surveyed, although the survey might have contained a surplus which would deprive the locator of his right to call for a patent for the whole quantity from the United States, the Ohio Agricultural and Mechanical College, claiming as grantee under the State of Ohio, cannot be considered as having any better or other rights than those of a subsequent locator. And from this the conclusion is deduced that the lands in controversy could not have passed by the terms of the Act of February 18, 1871. But this conclusion is not admissible. The State of Ohio, under the Act of February 18, 1871, was not in the position of a subsequent locator under existing laws; it was a grantee under the terms of a new law directly from Congress itself, and was not in the attitude of an applicant to the officers of the land department, under previous laws, asking to make a location upon lands which had been already withdrawn from subsequent location by an entry and an actual survey. Congress had dominion and an absolute power of disposal of all the lands in the Virginia military land district which at that time had not become legally appropriated by entry and survey, so as to entitle the locator, by virtue of his equitable estate actually vested under existing law, to call upon the officers of the land department to complete his legal title by the issue of a patent.

The meaning of the Act of February 18, 1871, therefore, seems to be to grant to the State of Ohio all the lands in the Virginia military district which had not at that time been legally surveyed and sold by the United States, in that sense of the word which conveys the idea of having parted with a beneficial title. The lands in controversy were within that description. They had been surveyed, it is true, in point of fact, but the survey was not lawful and valid as against the United States although it might operate to prevent a subsequent location under existing law. In point of fact, the officers of the land department refused to recognize the survey as binding, and rejected the application for the issue of a patent upon it. Upon this construction of the Act of February 18, 1871, the officers of the land department undoubtedly acted, as is evident from the terms of the Act of May 27, 1880. That Act was passed expressly for the purpose of construing and defining the Act of February 18, 1871, in order to change the interpretation which had in fact been put upon it. It declared that "the lands remaining 'unsurveyed and unsold' in the Virginia military district in the State of Ohio had no reference to lands which were included in any survey or entry within said district founded upon military warrant or warrants upon continental establishment," and that "the true intent and meaning of said Act was to cede to the State of Ohio only such lands as were unappropriated and not included in any survey or entry within said district, which survey or entry was founded upon military warrant or warrants upon continental establishment."

Supposing this legislative interpretation to mean that the unappropriated lands referred to were such as had not been included in any survey or entry founded upon a military warrant, whether that survey was legal or illegal under previous laws, nevertheless, we are of the opinion, with the Supreme Court of Ohio, that the fourth section of the Act must be held to have the legal operation and effect of confirming and ratifying previous titles made by the Ohio Agricultural and Mechanical College, under the Act of February 18, 1871. The fourth section declares that "This Act shall not in any way affect or interfere with the title to any land sold for a valuable consideration by the Ohio Agricultural and Mechanical College, grantee, under the Act of February 18, 1871." If the title of the Ohio Agricultural and Mechanical College, under the Act of February 18, 1871, was valid, the Act of May 27, 1880, giving for the future a new interpretation to that Act, could not have the effect of devesting its title. If, on the other hand, the title to lands sold by the Ohio Agricultural and Mechanical College, under claim of title by virtue of the Act of February 18, 1871, was unsupported by the terms of that Act, then section 4 of the Act of May 27, 1880, can have effect only as operating to confirm that title. This it was competent for Congress to do—no vested rights intervening—and this, in our opinion, is what they have done by the Act of May 27, 1880.

By the Act of August 7, 1882, 22 Stat. at L. 348, which, however, does not affect the present case, Congress found it necessary to go still farther and quiet the title of all persons claiming lands in the Virginia military district who had been in actual and open possession thereof for twenty years, under claim and color of title made in good faith, based upon, or deducible from, any entry founded upon a military warrant upon continental establishment, recorded in the office of the principal surveyor within the district prior to January 1, 1852.

We are, therefore, of opinion that the Supreme Court of Ohio did not err in either of the propositions on which its judgment was based.

There is another view which confirms this conclusion. It was decided by this court in the case of Russell v. Gregg, 113 U.S. 550 [28: 993], upon a careful and detailed review of all the legislation on the subject, that it was essential to the vesting of any interest under an entry and survey within the Virginia military land district, made prior to January 1, 1852, that the survey should be returned to the Commissioner of the General Land-Office at Washington, on or before that date, and that the failure to do so discharged "the land from any claim founded on such location and survey," and extinguished "all right, title, and estate previously acquired thereby." Such lands might, therefore, very properly be considered, in contemplation of law, as "unsurveyed." This continued to be the law until the passage of the Act of May 27, 1880, by the second section of which it was declared, "That all legal surveys returned to the land-office on or before March 3, 1857, on entries made on or before January 1, 1852, and founded upon unsatisfied Virginia military continental warrants, are hereby declared valid." The survey under which Coan claims title in the present case was not filed, as appears from evidence in the record, in the General Land-Office until April 26, 1852. It is contended by the plaintiff in error that it is otherwise admitted in the pleadings, on the ground that the answer of Coan averred, that, "on the 26th of December, A. D. 1851, the said E. P. Kendrick, surveyor for said district, duly certified said survey, being numbered (the same as said entry) 15882, to the General Land-Office at Washington, D. C., for patent, and that said survey has ever since been on file in said office." This is not a distinct and unequivocal averment of the fact that the survey had been filed in the General Land-Office on or before January 1, 1852, but only that it had been duly certified by the district surveyor prior to that date. But, construing it as claimed, it, nevertheless, was not admitted in the pleadings, the reply of the plaintiff expressly denying the validity of the entry and survey.

Objection is also made and was taken in the court below to the admission of the evidence on which the fact rests, that the survey was not filed until April 26, 1852, in the General Land-Office. This proof consists in copies of official letters written by the Commissioner of the General Land-Office to Heaton, then claiming title under the warrant and survey, reciting the fact, which copies were sworn to by a witness, formerly a clerk in the General Land-Office, and acquainted with the facts, he having, as such clerk, in fact written the originals himself for the Commissioner of the General Land-Office, by whom they were signed. We are not referred by counsel in argument to any authority in support of the objection, and we do not see upon what principle it can be maintained. The witness testified that at the time the letters were written he was the clerk in charge of the division relating to the Virginia military district, and that all of the decisions of the Commissioner of the General Land-Office were contained in letters written by him to the parties interested. We think the evidence was competent, and in fact it was uncontroverted.

Mr. Justice Blatchford delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a suit in equity brought in the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, in April, 1881, by Henry E. Davis, administrator de bonis non of Philip B. Fouke, deceased, against John J. Key. The object of the bill is to obtain an accounting from Key as to transactions between him and Fouke under an alleged partnership between them, entered into by a written agreement made September 24, 1869.

On the 10th of August, 1869, Key and Fouke, with one Hays and one De Castro, entered into a written agreement of copartnership, as follows:

"Articles of copartnership entered into between John J. Key, of the City of Terre Haute, State of Indiana; Philip B. Fouke, now, of the City of New Orleans, State of Louisiana; H. T. Hays and J. O. De Castro, both of the City of New Orleans, State of Louisiana.

"It is agreed between said parties that a copartnership is this day formed between them, for the purpose of prosecuting claims in behalf of the citizens of the United States of America against the Government of Mexico and of citizens of the Government of Mexico against the Government of the United States of America.

"It is agreed between said parties that the said Fouke, Hays and De Castro shall procure claims of citizens of the respective governments named against the other, and attend to taking the necessary proof, and that the said claims shall be sent to said Key, at Washington City, accompanied with a power of attorney from the claimant authorizing said Key to prosecute said claims, and authorizing him to receive from said governments any and all amounts that may be due and coming to them.

"That said Key shall retain all fees, as agreed on by said parties, and shall pay over to said parties, acting in the capacity of special attorneys, for that purpose, of the claimant, the amount due to them as such special attorneys, both for the amount awarded the claimant and for fees due Hays, Fouke, and De Castro in the case, either at Washington, New York, or New Orleans, as he may be directed from time to time by either Hays, Fouke, or De Castro, acting as the special agent of the claimant, whose power as such in all cases sent by them is, to all intents and purposes, recognized by the parties to this contract.

"That said Key shall retain, in all cases when no special direction is given, the portion due to said firm, paying over to the other parties at once, or accounting in such manner as they may from time to time direct, for the proportion of the fees so retained.

"It is agreed that all fees received under this copartnership shall be divided, one half part to said Key and the other half part to said Fouke, Hays, and De Castro.

"Said Key is to remain at Washington City, said Hays at New Orleans, said De Castro to be in the City of Mexico, and said Fouke is to render his services wherever they shall be needed.

"In witness whereof we have hereunto set our hands and seals this 10th day of August, 1869.

"JOHN J. KEY. [SEAL.]
"P. B. FOUKE. [SEAL.]
"HARRY T. HAYS. [SEAL.]
"J. O. DE CASTRO. [SEAL.]"

On the 24th of September, 1869, Fouke and Key executed the following agreement:

"Articles of copartnership entered into between Philip B. Fouke and John J. Key.

"It is agreed between said parties that a partnership be this day formed between them, for the purpose of practicing law in the City of Washington, District of Columbia, and that partnership shall be equal.

"It is agreed each party shall give their undivided attention to the business, and that said business embraces all matters pertaining to the profession of the law, including prosecution of claims against the Government of the United States, either before Congress or the court of claims. Neither party shall have the right to use the name of the firm except in such matters as pertain to the business of attorneys.

"It is understood and agreed that all sums received by said Key or Fouke under an agreement of partnership heretofore formed by said Key, Fouke, H. T. Hays, and J. O. De Castro shall be equally divided by said Fouke and Key.

"It is agreed that an account of expenses shall be kept between said parties pertaining to their business (except that part in prosecuting claims under the Treaty of July 4, 1868, between the United States and Mexico), and all sums received by either partner from their business, and all sums retained by either party, shall be entered on a book kept for that purpose, and the same shall be subject to the control of both.

"It is agreed that this copartnership shall continue until the 24th day of September, 1871, unless dissolved by mutual consent.

"In witness whereof we have, this 24th day of September, 1869, set our hands and seals.

"P. B. FOUKE. [SEAL.]
"JOHN J. KEY. [SEAL.]"

The bill alleges that certain business was conducted by Fouke and Key, pertaining to the profession of the law, and within the scope of the agreement of September 24, 1869, and that no accounting has been had in regard to it, although moneys were received by Key on account of it.

Two defenses are set up in the answer of Key: (1) that in April, 1870, Fouke accepted the appointment of Public Administrator for the Parish of Orleans, in the State of Louisiana, and thereafter resided in New Orleans, and did not practice law in the City of Washington, and that the copartnership formed by the agreement of September 24, 1869, was dissolved by the mutual assent of the parties; (2) that, by a written instrument, dated November 5, 1875, executed by Fouke and Key, and by Hays and De Castro, and by the clients interested in claims successfully prosecuted under the copartnership articles of August 10, 1869, all matters between Fouke and Key, in respect to such claims, were settled and adjusted.

A replication was filed to the answer, and proofs were taken, and the cause was heard in the first instance by the General Term. It dismissed the bill, and the plaintiff has appealed to this court.

It appears that Fouke never complied with the terms of the agreement of September 24, 1869. The copartnership was to continue until the 24th of September, 1871, unless dissolved by mutual consent. From April 2, 1870, until after the latter date, Fouke remained in New Orleans, discharging the duties of the office of public administrator there, did not practice law in the City of Washington, and did not give his undivided attention to the business of the copartnership. He returned to Washington in 1872 or 1873, and died there October 3, 1876, without having attempted to enforce the agreement of September 24, 1869. The evidence satisfies us that he regarded that agreement as never having gone into effect, or as having been canceled. We are also of opinion, that any claim under that agreement is inconsistent with the terms of the instrument of November 5, 1875, executed by Fouke and Key with other parties, so far as the matters covered by that instrument are concerned.

The decree of the court below is affirmed.

EDWARD J. HUBBARD, Admr., etc., of THOMAS LEITENSDORFER, Deceased.

1. A suit in equity to obtain the cancellation of an approved plat, delivered by the United States to an alleged actual settler, for a tract of land, part of the Las Animas grant, and to enjoin him from prosecuting any suit at law or in equity, on said plat as evidence of title, on the ground that it was illegal, and was wrongfully obtained, cannot be maintained by one who does not claim any part of the lands embraced in such plat, nor any equity therein, but who claims an undivided interest in the residuum of the grant that may remain after satisfying the claims of the actual settlers.

2. Nor can such suit be maintained on the ground that such approved plat, and the patent issued thereon, has cut off complainant's right to appeal from the decision of the register and receiver against himself on his own claim to an interest in said grant.

3. Under the terms of the Acts of June 21, 1860, 12 Stat. at L. 71, and of Feb. 25, 1869, 15 Stat. at L. 275, the ascertainment of who were actual settlers upon the Las Animas grant, and the proper limits of their settlement, and the adjustment thereof by surveys, were entrusted in the first instance to the determination of the register and receiver of the proper land district, and in case by law an appeal lies from their decision, then to those superior officers in the land-office and Department of the Interior to whom such an appeal might be taken; and as long as such alleged rights are in the course of adjudication by such special tribunal to which they are referred for settlement, the function of that tribunal cannot be displaced by courts of justice.

4. The right of appeal from the decision of the register and receiver is not hindered by the fraudulent character of the decision appealed from, and the appeal itself is the mode pointed out by law for the correction of any error in the decision complained of, whether that error has been produced by fraud and corruption, or by mistake.

Argued Oct. 12, 13, 1887. Decided Oct. 31, 1887.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Colorado. Reversed.

Statement by Mr. Justice Matthews:

Under the Treaty with Mexico of Guadalupe Hidalgo, Cornelio Vigil and Ceran St. Vrain claimed title, under a Mexican grant made in 1843, to a large tract of land embraced within the Huerfano, Pisipa, and Cucharos Rivers to their junction with the Arkansas and Animas, known as the Las Animas grant, and supposed to cover and include about 922 square leagues, lying in the Territory of New Mexico, but within the limits of the present State of Colorado, and equivalent to four millions of acres.

By the Act to confirm certain private land claims in the Territory of New Mexico, approved June 21, 1860, 12 Stat. at L. 71, Congress confirmed the claim of Vigil and St. Vrain, but only to the extent of eleven square leagues to each of said claimants. By the second section of that Act it was provided "that in surveying the claims of said Cornelio Vigil and Ceran St. Vrain the location shall be made as follows, namely: The survey shall first be made of all tracts occupied by actual settlers holding possession under titles or promises to settle, which have heretofore been given by said Vigil and St. Vrain, in the tracts claimed by them, and after deducting the area of all such tracts from the area embraced in twenty-two square leagues, the remainder shall be located in two equal tracts, each of square form, in any part of the tract claimed by the said Vigil and St. Vrain selected by them; and it shall be the duty of the Surveyor-General of New Mexico immediately to proceed to make the surveys and locations authorized and required by the terms of this section."

The fourth section of the Act provides "that the foregoing confirmation shall only be construed as quitclaims or relinquishments on the part of the United States, and shall not affect the adverse rights of any other person or persons whomsoever."

This statute was amended by the Act of February 25, 1869, 15 Stat. at L. 275, 440, as follows:

"CHAP. XLVII.—An Act to Amend an Act Entitled 'An Act to Confirm Certain Private Land Claims in the Territory of New Mexico.'

"Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the exterior lines of the Cornelio Vigil and Ceran St. Vrain claims of eleven leagues each, subject to claims derived from said parties as confirmed by the Act of Congress approved twenty-first June, eighteen hundred and sixty, United States Statutes, volume twelve, page seventy-one, shall be adjusted according to the lines of the public surveys, as nearly as practicable, with the limits of said claims, yet in as compact a form as possible; and the claims of all actual settlers upon the tracts heretofore claimed by the said Vigil and St. Vrain, holding possession under titles or promises to settle, which have been made by said Vigil and St. Vrain, or their legal representatives, prior to the passage of this Act, who may establish their claims within one year from the passage of this Act, to the satisfaction of the register and receiver of the proper land district, shall in like manner be adjusted according to the subdivisional lines of survey, so as to include the lands so settled upon or purchased, and the areas of the same shall be deducted and excluded from the adjusted limits of the claims of said Vigil and St. Vrain respectively; and the claims of all other actual settlers falling within the limits of the located claims of Vigil and St. Vrain shall be adjusted to the extent which shall embrace their several settlements upon their several claims being established either as preemption or homesteads, according to law; and for the aggregate of the areas of the latter class of claims the said Vigil and St. Vrain, or their legal representatives, shall be entitled to locate a like quantity of public lands, not mineral, according to the lines of the public surveys, and not to exceed one hundred and sixty acres in one section.

"Sec. 2. And it be further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the General Land-Office to cause the lines of the public surveys to be run in the regions where a proper location would place the said Vigil and St. Vrain claims, and that the expense of the same shall be paid out of any moneys in the treasury not otherwise appropriated; yet, before the confirmation of the said Act of June twenty-first, eighteen hundred and sixty, shall become legally effective, the said Vigil and St. Vrain, or their legal representatives, shall pay the cost of so much of said surveys as enures to their benefit respectively, and that all settlers of the said third class, whose claims may be adjusted as valid, shall have the right to enter their improvements by a strict compliance with the preemption or homestead laws.

"Sec. 3. And it be further enacted, That upon the adjustment of the Vigil and St. Vrain claims according to the provisions of this Act, it shall be the duty of the surveyor-general of the district to furnish proper approved plats to said claimants, or their legal representatives, and so in like manner to said derivative claimants, which shall be evidence of title, the same to be done according to such instructions as may be given by the Commissioner of the General Land-Office.

"Sec. 4. And it be further enacted, That immediately upon running the lines as provided in section second of this Act, the surveyor-general of said district shall notify the said Vigil and St. Vrain, or their agents or legal representatives, of the fact of such survey being made, and said claimants shall, within three months after notice of such survey, select and locate their said claims in accordance with such survey and the provisions of this Act and of the Act to which this is amendatory, so far as the same is not changed by this Act, and shall within said time furnish the surveyor-general with the description of such location, specifying the lines of the same. And the party failing to make such selection and location, in such manner and within such time, shall be deemed and held to have abandoned their claim, and their rights and equities under this Act, and the Act to which this is amendatory, shall cease and terminate.

"Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That in case of the neglect or refusal of the said Vigil and St. Vrain, or either of them, to accept of the provisions of this Act and the Act to which this is amendatory, and to locate their said claims, as provided therein, no suit shall be brought or proceedings instituted in any of the courts of the United States, by such party or by any one claiming through or under them, to establish or enforce said claims, or for any cause of action founded upon the same, after six months from the passage of this Act."

The time fixed by section 1 of the last recited Act for establishing the derivative claims was extended by a Joint Resolution of April 28, 1870, 16 Stat. at L. 373, 663, by which it was directed that the Act should be so construed "As to authorize the presentation of such derivative claims within one year from the completion and approval of the subdivisional surveys contemplated by said Act of twenty-fifth February, eighteen hundred and sixty-nine."

In pursuance of the Act of February 25, 1869, and within the time limited by the Joint Resolution of April 28, 1870, there were presented to Irving W. Stanton and Charles A. Cook, the register and receiver at Pueblo, Colorado, claims on behalf of about thirty-nine derivative claimants to lands within the limits of the Las Animas grant, covering in all more than 183,553$\frac{55}{100}$ acres; among them was the claim of William Craig for 127,000 acres, and that of Thomas Leitensdorfer for about 16,000 acres, which were filed on the 23d of October, 1872. The register and receiver acted upon all the claims, rejecting that of Leitensdorfer and twenty-two others, amounting to more than 85,939$\frac{88}{100}$ acres. They decided favorably, in whole or in part, on thirteen claims. To twelve of these claimants they allowed 24,362$\frac{99}{100}$ acres; the remaining 73,251$\frac{55}{100}$ acres were awarded to Craig. The decisions of these officers upon these claims bear date February 23, 1874, and were immediately reported to the General Land-Office. Nineteen of the claimants, whose claims had been rejected, and among them Leitensdorfer, appealed from the decisions in favor of Craig and against themselves, respectively. The Commissioner of the General Land-Office entertained the appeals, so far as to decide that an appeal would lie in such cases, and from that decision Craig appealed from the Commissioner of the General Land-Office to the Secretary of the Interior. This appeal was entertained, and the Secretary of the Interior rendered a decision sustaining the authority of the Commissioner of the General Land-Office to entertain and determine the appeals from the register and receiver.

About the 25th of May, 1875, Craig applied to the President for an order directing that the Surveyor-General of Colorado be required to issue a plat of the survey of the land awarded to Craig by the decision of the register and receiver. Being advised by the attorney-general, to whom the matter was referred, that under the terms of the Acts of Congress relating to the subject the decisions of the register and receiver were final, from which no appeal would lie to the commissioner (15 Ops. Attys-Gen. 94), the President, on March 2, 1877, made an order directing the Commissioner of the General Land-Office to instruct the Surveyor-General of Colorado to deliver to Craig an approved plat of the land adjudged to him by the register and receiver of the Pueblo land district, in the State of Colorado, dated February 23, 1874. The Commissioner of the General Land-Office, on March 7, 1877, instructed the Surveyor-General of Colorado to prepare a plat of the lands specified and awarded by the register and receiver to Craig.

Before that plat was delivered Leitensdorfer, on May 4, 1877, filed his bill in equity in the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Colorado, against William L. Campbell, the Surveyor-General of the United States for Colorado, and Craig. In this bill he set out the matters above stated, and in addition thereto alleged that his own title was derived by mesne conveyances from Eugene Leitensdorfer, to whom Vigil and St. Vrain had conveyed an undivided one sixth of the entire grant to them, which would have amounted to about 632,724⅛ acres if the whole grant had been confirmed, but which he had reduced to twenty-five sections, amounting to about 16,000 acres, to correspond with the reduced grant as confirmed by Act of Congress.

The bill further alleged that the reduced tract thus claimed by the complainant before the register and receiver was in or near the valleys of the Las Animas or Purgatoire River and tributaries, in Pueblo land district, Las Animas County, Colorado, naming and identifying certain sections and half sections as composing it; and admitted that the claim of the complainant, as thus reduced, did not conflict on the ground with the derivative claim of Craig.

The bill further alleged that the complainant produced evidence before the register and receiver to establish, in addition to the preceding allegations of his bill, "the continuous inhabitancy and cultivation of his claim by himself since May, 1862, which inhabitancy and cultivation still continue."

The bill also alleged that the final delivery by the surveyor-general of the plat of survey of the derivative claims of Craig, as ordered by the President, would be merely a ministerial act of the surveyor-general, and therefore the subject of an injunction; that such plats, under section 3 of the Act of February 25, 1869, could only issue after the final adjustment of the whole of said confirmation of twenty-two leagues, and of the several derivative claims constituting the same, and that said plats, when so furnished, would be evidence of title, and would divest the United States of the fee simple in favor of the derivative claimants receiving such plats; "that the plat ordered to be delivered by the surveyor-general to or for Craig would leave no part of said confirmation applicable to complainant's claim or the claims of the other derivative claimants whose appeals are now pending before the commissioner, and would, in fact, preclude the commissioner from considering the appeals of complainant and of the other derivative claimants; that complainant's claim is not in conflict on the ground with Craig's claim, but is many miles distant, and the mass of the derivative claims under Vigil and St. Vrain, though greatly exceeding the quantity confirmed, are competitors for area, but not for specific locations; that for these reasons the delivery of Craig's plat, or of the plat of any derivative claim whatever, before the final decision by the commissioner and secretary of the said appeals now pending before the Commissioner, and the final adjustment by them of the whole mass of said derivative claims, would be against equity and the rights of complainant and other appellants in said appeals, and would inflict on complainant and said appellants irreparable injury."

The prayer of the bill was for a perpetual injunction to restrain the delivery of the plat and survey of the derivative claim of Craig "until the appeals of complainant and of the other derivative claimants under them, now pending before the Commissioner of the General Land-Office, shall be tried and finally adjudged on their merits, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, according to law, and until it shall appear by such final judgment that said Craig, or other derivative claimants under said Vigil and St. Vrain, or either, are entitled to plats as evidence of title;" and also for an injunction to the same effect in the mean time.

The bill also contained a general allegation to the effect that the register and receiver were corrupted by Craig, and fraudulently induced to make the award in his favor.

On the 21st of May, 1877, a temporary injunction was granted as prayed for, on certain conditions, one of which was, that the complainant, within thirty days, should "commence proceedings in the proper court of the District of Columbia, having for their object an order on the General Land-Office to hear and determine the appeals mentioned and described in the said bill of complaint as having been taken by the said complainant from the decision of the register and receiver of the land-office at Pueblo, in respect to the lands described in the said bill."

On the 25th of June, 1877, an affidavit was filed showing that, on the 19th of June, the complainant had cause to be filed in the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia a petition and affidavit for a mandamus against the Commissioner of the General Land-Office, praying for a writ commanding him to proceed to hear and determine the said appeals.

On July 13, 1877, the present cause was heard on a demurrer to the bill, and on a motion to dissolve the injunction, when an order was made dissolving the injunction and sustaining the demurrer, with leave to the complainant to file an amended and supplemental bill, which he accordingly did. That bill, filed on October 6, 1877, reciting all the matters contained in the original bill, alleges in addition that, in the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, on July 3, 1877, the motion of the complainant for a rule on the Commissioner of the General Land-Office to show cause why the writ of mandamus should not issue against him, to require him to proceed with the hearing of the appeals alleged to be pending before him, was denied by that court at special term, on the ground, among others, that no appeal lay to the Commissioner of the General Land-Office from such decisions, and that he did not appeal from said judgment because he was advised by counsel that no appeal would lie from such a judgment.

The bill further alleges that, after the dissolution of the injunction, the Commissioner of the General Land-Office delivered to Craig an approved plat of the survey of the lands according to the area allowed to him by the register and receiver at Pueblo.

The bill reiterates the charges of corruption and fraud as against Craig and the register and receiver in the original bill, and further shows, "that, for the reasons hereinbefore stated, said duplicate plats of defendant Craig are intrinsically illegal and void ab initio, and that Craig had, or has, no title to said lands, St. Vrain having sold his interest before Craig purchased; that the order of the President, which said plats are intended to enforce, is, also, for reasons hereinbefore stated, intrinsically illegal and void ab initio, and was granted under the erroneous belief by the President that no controversy existed respecting the quantity of land embraced in said plats; that said plats were issued in mistake of law and fact, and leave no land applicable to the derivative claims of your orator and the other said appellants before the Commissioner of the General Land-Office, and, in fact, prevent him from trying their appeals now lawfully pending before him, and are in the nature of a cloud on the titles of your orator and the said appellants to their respective derivative claims; and that your orator fears said duplicate plats, if left uncanceled, would cause irreparable mischief to him and to all the other said appellants before the said commissioner."

The prayer of the amended bill, therefore, is, that "the approved plats of the derivative claim of defendant, William Craig signed by defendant Campbell, on the 26th of May, 1877, be decreed void from the beginning, and that said defendant, William Craig, be forever enjoined from prosecuting any suit in law or equity on said approved plat or plats as evidence of title, or that Craig be adjudged as holding the same in trust for plaintiff and other derivative claimants, and that defendant, William Craig, and agents, and defendant, William L. Campbell, as United States Surveyor-General of Colorado, and his successors in office, and all under them, be ordered, within a time to be limited by this court, to deliver the said plats to the court, and that the said plats be thereupon canceled; and he prays for all other general and special relief applicable to the case."

To this amended and supplemental bill, Campbell and Craig filed separate demurrers. The demurrer of Campbell was sustained, and the bill as to him ordered to be dismissed. The demurrer of Craig was overruled, and thereupon, on the 7th of October, 1878, Craig filed his answer to the amended bill.

The answer of Craig denies the title of Leitensdorfer to any interest in the land, and asserts the title of Craig himself to the land awarded to him by the decision of the register and receiver; it denies all charges of fraud and corruption against them and himself; and claims that the award and decision of the register and receiver, under the Act of Congress of February 25, 1869, is final and conclusive, subject to no appeal to the Commissioner of the General Land-Office, or to the Secretary of the Interior, and sets up the decision and judgment of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, dismissing the application for a mandamus, as a conclusive judgment on the question.

A replication was filed to this answer, and the cause being put at issue a large amount of proof was taken, consisting of documentary evidence and the testimony of witnesses.

It further appears that after the 4th of March 1877, when a new administration came into office, an application was made to the Secretary of the Interior on behalf of the complainant, asking for a stay of proceedings under the order of the President, and that the matter might be reopened for hearing before the Commissioner of the General Land-Office on the appeal from the decision of the register and receiver. This application was referred to the attorney-general, who gave an opinion that the official acts of the officers of the preceding administration could not be reviewed by their successors in office. 15 Ops. Attys-Gen. 208.

On the 8th of January, 1878, a patent was issued by the United States to William Craig, and to his heirs and assigns forever, for the land included within the approved plat, in conformity, as it recites, with section 2447 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, and with the stipulation that, in virtue of the provisions of that section, the patent "shall only operate as a relinquishment of title on the part of the United States, and shall in no manner interfere with any valid adverse right to the same land, nor be construed to preclude a legal investigation and decision by the proper judicial tribunal between adverse claimants to the same land."

On January 30, 1879, before final hearing, the complainant dismissed the bill and amended bill so far as by the prayer it was sought to hold the defendant Craig liable as trustee for the complainant of the title to the lands conveyed to him.

The opinion and decision of the register and receiver in favor of Craig's claim recites the grounds of the award as follows: "His claim does not rest wholly upon the shadowy foundation of uncertain and vague promises, but is backed by conveyances which remove all suspicion or doubt from his asserted rights, and in our opinion cannot be postponed to any other claim than those above recited. If his claim rested on promises to settle only, it might be said that the promises dated as far back as 1855, and the month of March of that year; that he went on the land promised; that he offered his resignation in the Army in consequence of it; that it was not accepted; that in December, 1862, he was appointed agent for the grant by St. Vrain, and then again resigned, and was refused acceptance; that in the spring of 1863 he began the improvement of his land, finally got out of the Army in 1864, and moved on the land, where he has since resided continuously, and has expended $200,000 in improvements thereon; the patent deeds of St. Vrain showing the extent of his rights—deeds which appear to have been duly recorded soon after execution—thus preventing any one being deceived as to the property claimed by him."

The decision of the register and receiver against the claim of Leitensdorfer is based upon these grounds, viz.: that there is no sufficient proof of the paper title by which he claims an undivided one sixth of the original Mexican grant; that that paper title, even if proven, would not entitle him to anything as against actual settlers, but only to one sixth of any surplus which might be ascertained after satisfying the claims of that class; and that Leitensdorfer was not entitled to claim as an actual settler, even supposing that he had taken possession of a particular location, for the reason that he does not show himself to have acquired that possessory interest from either of the original grantees.

The cause having proceeded to final hearing, a decree was entered July 2, 1880, whereby it was "ordered, adjudged and decreed that the decision or award of the register and receiver of the land described in the bill and pleadings of date the 23d of February, 1874, in favor of the defendant, William Craig, is fraudulent and void; and it is further ordered, adjudged, and decreed, that the patent for the said lands issued to defendant, William Craig, on the 8th day of January, 1878, be and it is hereby declared and decreed to be null and void; and that the approved plat or plats delivered to defendant, William Craig, as evidence of title to the land described in the bill, by William Campbell, Surveyor-General, be and the same are hereby declared and decreed to be null and void." From that decree this appeal is prosecuted. Pending the appeal in this court, both parties having died, the cause has been revived in the names of their respective personal representatives.

Dan. Ch. Pl. & Pr. 192.

As there is no residuum for the original grantees, there are no lands to which Leitensdorfer's interest can attach.

The fourth section of the Act of February 25, 1869, was not complied with.

The lands claimed are not within the boundaries of the original grant.

The court may examine the surveys to see for itself where the line would run.

By reference to the provisions of the Act of 21st of June, 1860, 12 Stat. at L. 71, and of the Act of the 25th February, 1869, 15 Stat. at L. 275, it will appear that after the survey of the exterior lines of the Las Animas grant, the claims first to be provided for were those of all actual settlers holding possession under "titles or promises to settle" made by Vigil and St. Vrain, or their legal representatives, prior to the passage of the Act. It was required that those claims, within one year from the passage of the Act, should be established to the satisfaction of the register and receiver of the proper land district, when they were to be adjusted according to the subdivisional lines of survey so as to include the lands so settled upon or purchased. It follows, of course, that these were to be surveys of distinct locations, which might be widely separated from each other in different parts of the original Mexican grant, but, of course, within its exterior limits. The grant itself, however, having been confirmed only to the extent of twenty-two square leagues, it also follows that these surveys in their aggregate areas were not to exceed that quantity. If, however, there were other actual settlers within the limits of the original grant to Vigil and St Vrain, not claiming title from or under them, but merely by reason of their actual possession, their several settlements might be established either as preëmption rights or homesteads, according to law, but the quantities were not to be deducted from the twenty-two square leagues. If any part of this quantity of twenty-two square leagues should remain unexhausted by the claims of actual settlers holding possession under "titles or promises to settle" made by Vigil and St. Vrain, and, therefore, called in this record "derivative claims," any such surplus was to be located in two equal tracts, each of square form, in any part of the tract covered by the original grant, for the benefit of Vigil and St. Vrain, and their assigns or representatives.

It is conceded by all parties to this record, that, in point of fact, the claims of the first class, including Craig's, being those of actual settlers holding possession under titles or promises to settle made by Vigil and St. Vrain, exhausted the whole quantity of the grant as confirmed and reduced to twenty-two square leagues. The controversy now is, therefore, confined to the conflicting claims of this class.

It is further to be observed that the complainant Leitensdorfer lays no claim to any part of the lands embraced in the survey and plat, and covered by the patent issued to Craig; he does not allege or complain that any lands belonging in equity to him were awarded to another; he admits that he was not an actual settler upon and held no possession of any part of that tract. On the contrary, the possession which he does allege and the title which he asserts have reference to another and distinct tract of land, which, as he alleges, lies within the exterior boundaries of the original Las Animas grant, but several miles distant from any part of the tract allotted and patented to Craig. He, therefore, does not claim as a part of his case in equity that Craig holds the legal title to any lands in trust for him. The prayer of the amended bill, so far as it asserted any right to such relief, was expressly withdrawn, and has been abandoned by counsel in argument.

The case presented, therefore, by the complainant is not one of that class of which many instances may be found in the reports of the decisions of this court, where a defendant holding the legal title under a patent from the United States has been declared to hold that legal title merely as trustee for a complainant with a superior equity, and decreed to hold for or to convey to the true owner. The right of the complainant in this case to relief is supposed to rest upon different grounds. The injury which he alleges is that Craig wrongfully obtained from the register and receiver an award of lands to which he had no rightful claim, whereby the whole quantity of the confirmed grant has been reduced and absorbed so as to exclude the complainant from that share to which he was entitled. The wrong of which he complains is that Craig fraudulently and corruptly procured the award and decision of the register and receiver in his own behalf and against Leitensdorfer, and that the latter has been illegally cut off from his right to appeal from the decision of the register and receiver in favor of Craig and against himself, by the illegal and unauthorized issue and delivery to Craig by the surveyor-general of the approved plat of the survey of the lands awarded to him, confirmed by the subsequent issue of a formal patent relinquishing the title of the United States to the same tract. This is a short but accurate statement of the complainant's case as he presents it for examination and analysis, and for which we are to seek a rule of decision.

The fraud and corruption alleged against Craig, and which, for the purposes of the case, we are at present to assume to have been proved, as it was in fact found by the decree appealed from, do not necessarily vitiate Craig's claim of title nor establish that of Leitensdorfer. The charge is that Craig bribed the register and receiver to make the award which they did in his favor. It may, nevertheless, be true that the award ought so to have been made upon the merits. So the register and receiver may have been right in rejecting the claim of Leitensdorfer. This possibility is tacitly admitted, for the bill does not ask a declaration and decree that Craig has no valid claim, nor a decree establishing the claim of Leitensdorfer; and it is plainly not within the jurisdiction of the circuit court to grant any such relief, even if it were asked.

The ascertainment of what persons came within the description of actual settlers under titles or promises to settle upon the Las Animas grant, and the proper limits of their actual settlement and possession and the adjustment thereof by suitable surveys, were entrusted by the Acts of Congress on that subject in the first instance to the determination of the register and receiver of the proper land district, and in case by law an appeal lies from their decision, then to those superior officers in the land-office and the Department of the Interior to whom such an appeal might be taken. The adjustment of these claims and their definition by the prescribed surveys and plats establishing them in their appropriate locations within the limits of the original grant, and all questions of possession, of boundary and of conflict constitute a part of the administration of the law confided to that branch of the Executive Department. The free course of that administration within the limits of the law cannot be interrupted or interfered with by the judicial power. Undoubtedly, private rights of great value and importance may be involved, and the exercise of executive discretion may require decisions in favor of some and against others in a conflict of interests and claims. But, as all these claims and titles and interests arise under the law, which refers their settlement to executive officers, that reference is itself a condition and qualification of the right, and the latter is altogether subject to its consequences. When the department has exercised its discretion and exhausted its function, the legal and equitable effect of what it has done or failed to do may be drawn in question when necessary to the determination of conflicting rights between private parties in a judicial proceeding; but as long as the alleged rights which are the subject of contention are in the course of adjudication by the special tribunal to which they are referred for settlement, the function of that tribunal cannot be displaced by courts of justice. And what the complainant in this case really asks for as his ultimate relief is that the way may be cleared for him to the exercise of the right of appeal, which he claims, from the adverse decision of the register and receiver to the Commissioner of the General Land-Office, by the removal of those obstructions which he alleges have been illegally interposed against him by the issue of the approved survey and plat by the Surveyor-General of Colorado upon the order of the President, in disregard and denial of his right of appeal, and the subsequent issue of the patent, in consequence of which the Commissioner of the General Land-Office and the Secretary of the Interior have decided that they are precluded from now entertaining the complainant's appeal. It is supposed that these obstructions are removed by the decree of the circuit court, which adjudges that the decision and award of the register and receiver in favor of Craig is fraudulent and void, and annuls and declares void the approved plat delivered to Craig by the Surveyor-General of Colorado and the patent issued to him for the same lands. The decree seeks to destroy the foundation and muniments of Craig's title to the particular lands described in the plat and patent, but it does not award those lands to any one else, and it does not assume to establish the title of Leitensdorfer to those which he claims. What is the effect of this decree? In any action brought by a stranger to this record against Craig for the recovery of the lands covered by his patent, this decree could not operate as evidence against him; it can only be effective by way of estoppel, and a stranger to the record cannot avail himself of an estoppel by which he is not himself bound. Nor can the decree be supposed to operate upon the record of the survey and plat and of the decision of the register and receiver as they remain recorded in the land department, so as to render them null and void, as if they had never existed, and bind and oblige the officers of the Department of the Interior to proceed in the administration of the law with reference to these lands as if nothing of that sort had taken place. The decree operates only in personam and inter partes. The courts have no control of the public records of the land department, nor supervision over the conduct of its officers, otherwise than as it can be exercised in appropriate cases by the writ of mandamus; besides which, to annul the decision of the register and receiver, if that were possible, would be to destroy the foundation of the complainant's appeal and restore the matter to the condition in which it was when all the claims were pending before the register and receiver. This result is not within the scope of the complainant's bill.

If, on the other hand, the operation of the decree is limited so as to cancel and annul the approved plat delivered by the surveyor-general and the patent issued thereupon, leaving the decision of the register and receiver to stand as the subject of an appeal to the Commissioner of the General Land-Office, supposed to be still pending, the case of the complainant for equitable interference does not seem to be bettered. For, in that event, what power has the circuit court, sitting in Colorado as a court of equity, to enforce and make effective the complainant's supposed right of appeal? The decree does not operate upon the officers whose action is invoked as necessary to secure the complainant's alleged rights. The process of a court of equity is not appropriate to the exigency, and the Circuit Court of the United States in Colorado has no jurisdiction, either at law or in equity, over the officers of the land department to compel them to entertain the appeal. Neither is there reason to suppose that the land department will on the basis of such a decree sua sponte proceed with the appeal as pending, or take such action on the application of the complainant.

The ground on which Mr. Schurz, as Secretary of the Interior, upon the advice of the Attorney-General, Mr. Devens, declined to reopen and rehear the case was that the matter had been finally acted upon by his predecessor in office. 15 Ops. Attys-Gen. 208. That fact remains, notwithstanding a decree in this case declaring the survey and plat and patent to Craig to be illegal and invalid. Such a declaration and decree operates only in the case and between the parties to this record. It does not operate, as has been already stated, upon the public records of the land department in which they are recorded, nor does it bind and oblige the executive officers of the government in control of that department. Such a decree, therefore, would grant to the complainant no practical relief; it would be vain and nugatory.

The ground which it is claimed in argument justifies such a decree is, that, pending Leitensdorfer's appeal to the Commissioner of the General Land-Office, the delivery by the surveyor-general of the approved survey and plat, under the order of the President, was illegal and void, and that by reason thereof the subsequent issue of the patent could not operate as a confirmation or conveyance of the title. But if the order of the President, interrupting the course of the appeal in the land department, and the action of the officers of that department in compliance with it, were illegal and therefore void, they were and are of no force and efficacy, either at law or in equity, and are not binding on any succeeding incumbents of the offices of Commissioner of the General Land-Office or Secretary of the Interior. It follows that the case of the complainant, based upon his right to prosecute his appeal, is as complete without such a decree as with it. If the duty of the Commissioner of the General Land-Office to entertain and determine that appeal exists as contended, it is a legal duty. That duty is to take up, consider, and adjudge the rights of the parties in interest, and the entertaining of the appeal is a purely ministerial act, although the questions to be considered in the course of that appeal are to be resolved by the exercise of official discretion and judgment. Nevertheless, it is quite clear, as it has been oftentimes decided, that the duty of entering upon their consideration and proceeding to their determination, is strictly ministerial. The remedy in such cases is at law, by means of a writ of mandamus, and not in equity. Ex parte Parker, 120 U. S. 737 [30: 818]; Ex parte Brown, 116 U. S. 401 [29: 676]. If, to such a writ, issued by a competent court, the officer should make return that he was precluded from entertaining the appeal by reason of the prior action of a predecessor in office, under the order of the President, the question of the sufficiency of that return would be presented to the court issuing the writ, and would involve necessarily the adjudication of the questions mooted in this case. If such a return should, in such a tribunal, be adjudged to be sufficient, then the complainant would be without remedy, for the right which he claims, if it exists, is a legal right cognizable in courts of law, and not a right resting upon any equity within the jurisdiction of chancery courts. If, on the other hand, such a return in such a proceeding should be adjudged to be insufficient, then the complainant would have the remedy which he is here seeking, by a direct and effective process binding upon the parties whose conduct he is seeking to control. In either alternative, therefore, it is equally conclusive that the complainant cannot obtain, in this cause, the relief which he seeks, and which alone is adequate to the redress of the wrong of which he complains.

This conclusion is not disturbed or affected by the assumption that the decision and award of the register and receiver was obtained by corrupt and fraudulent practices for which Craig is responsible. The right of appeal from that decision to the Commissioner of the General Land-Office, if it exists in any case, is not hindered by the fraudulent character of the decision appealed from, and the appeal itself is the mode pointed out by law for the correction of any error that may be shown in the decision complained of, whether that error has been produced by the practice of fraud and corruption, or was merely an honest mistake. The proof of such fraud and corruption does not, as has been already stated, demonstrate error. The decision may be right, notwithstanding the fraud, and on the appeal Craig's title, as it now stands upon the approved survey and plat and the patent, may be adjudged to be valid, and any error in it we must assume will be corrected, whether fraudulent or innocent. The question of fraud, therefore, alleged against Craig and the register and receiver, in view of the relief asked, is immaterial.

There is an alternative in which it might be supposed that the question of fraud in procuring the decision of the register and receiver, and thereby obtaining the muniments of title on which Craig's claim now rests, might become material for determination in a judicial cause. That alternative is the supposition, contrary to that on which the complainant rests his case, that the decision of the register and receiver, the issue of the approved survey and plat, and of the patent based thereon, are final and conclusive upon the Department of the Interior, and not subject to the appeal taken to the Commissioner of the General Land-Office. It may be asked whether such a determination of inferior officers of the land department, involving private rights and interests of great magnitude and value, infected with fraud, is to be protected from attack by judicial process. We are told that "equity has always had jurisdiction of fraud, misrepresentation, and concealment, and it does not depend upon discovery." Jones v. Bolles, 76 U. S. 9 Wall. 364, 369 [19: 734, 736]. That equity will interfere by a proper proceeding where the executive power has exhausted itself. Holloway v. Whiteley, 71 U. S. 4 Wall. 522 [18: 335]; Gaines v. Thompson, 74 U. S. 7 Wall. 347 [19: 62]; Litchfield v. Register and Receiver, 76 U. S. 9 Wall. 575 [19: 681]; Sampson v. Smiley, 80 U. S. 13 Wall. 91 [20: 489]; Johnson v. Towsley, 80 U. S. 13 Wall. 72 [20: 485]; Warren v. Van Brunt, 86 U. S. 19 Wall. 646 [22: 219]. "That the officers of the land department are specially designated by law to receive, consider, and pass upon proofs presented with respect to settlements upon the public lands with a view to secure rights of preemption. If they err in the construction of the law applicable to any case, or if fraud is practiced upon them, or they themselves are chargeable with fraudulent practices, their rulings may be reviewed and annulled by the courts when a controversy arises between private parties founded upon their decisions." Shepley v. Cowan, 91 U. S. 340 [23: 428]; Moore v. Robbins, 96 U. S. 530 [24: 848]. This doctrine is undoubtedly true, but its limitation is found in the statement that such rulings "may be reviewed and annulled by the courts when a controversy arises between parties, founded upon their decisions." The jurisdiction to determine such questions does not arise in the courts of the United States by virtue of any power of supervision given to them whereby they have a right to control, to correct, to reverse, and to dictate the procedure and action of executive officers within the scope of the duties confided to them by law. No such power of revision is given, and none such can be exercised. Such a function is not judicial; it is administrative, executive, and political in its nature. The abstract right to interfere in such cases has been uniformly denied by judicial tribunals, as breaking down the distinction so important and well defined in our system between the several, separate, and independent branches of the government; and where the character of the interference sought falls within that designation, the application for it has been uniformly denied.

The case is different in a litigation between parties involving a contest of conflicting claims, where under some known head of jurisdiction definite relief or redress may be conclusively administered in favor of one and against the other party. In such cases, the right at law or in equity belongs to one or the other of the contestants; to which of the two it should be awarded is the judicial question involved. The solution of that question may depend upon the effect to be given, either at law or in equity, to some action or determination of the executive officers charged in the first instance with duties of administration in connection with the subject of the litigation, such as, for example, the officers of the land department in the administration of the system of law in reference to the public domain of the United States. It is in such cases that the question has most frequently arisen. In those cases it has, indeed, been held, as claimed, that if the executive officer has made a mistake of law in his administration; if he has exercised power without authority of law; if his determination has been procured by the fraudulent practices of one party upon the officer or upon the opposite party; or if the officer has himself fraudulently decided in favor of one and against the other, a court of justice will give effect to the rights of the parties as between themselves, notwithstanding the errors and the frauds alleged and shown. The principle is that "the decision of the officers of the land department, made within the scope of their authority on questions of this kind, is in general conclusive everywhere, except when considered by way of appeal within that department; and that as to the facts on which their decision is based, in the absence of fraud or mistake, that decision is conclusive even in courts of justice when the title afterwards comes in question. But that in this class of cases, as in all others, there exists in the courts of equity the jurisdiction to correct mistakes, to relieve against frauds and impositions, and, in cases where it is clear that those officers have by a mistake of the law given to one man the land which on the undisputed facts belonged to another, to give appropriate relief." Moore v. Robbins, 96 U. S. 530, 535 [24:848, 850]; Shepley v. Cowan, 91 U. S. 330 [23:424]; Johnson v. Towsley, 80 U. S. 13 Wall. 72 [20:485]; Marquez v. Frisbie, 101 U. S. 473 [25:800]; Vance v. Burbank, 101 U. S. 514 [25:929]; Quinby v. Conlan, 104 U. S. 420, 425 [26:800, 802]; White v. Cannon, 78 U. S. 6 Wall. 443 [18:928]; Silver v. Ladd, 74 U. S. 7 Wall. 219, 228 [19:138, 141].

In St. Louis Smelting Co. v. Kemp, 104 U. S., 636, 647 [26:875, 879], it was said. "If in issuing a patent its officers took mistaken views of the law, or drew erroneous conclusions from the evidence, or acted from imperfect views of their duty, or even from corrupt motives, a court of law can afford no remedy to a party alleging that he is thereby aggrieved. He must resort to a court of equity for relief; and even there his complaint cannot be heard unless he connect himself with the original source of title, so as to be able to aver that his rights are injuriously affected by the existence of the patent; and he must possess such equities as will control the legal title in the patentee's hands."

And in Silver v. Ladd, 74 U. S. 7 Wall. 219, 228 [19:138,141], the doctrine was stated in these terms: "The relief given in this class of cases does not proceed upon the ground of annulling or setting aside the patent wrongfully issued. That would leave the title in the United States, and the plaintiff might be as far from obtaining justice as before. And it may be well doubted whether the patent can be set aside without the United States being a party to the suit. The relief granted is founded on the theory that the title which has passed from the United States to the defendant enured in equity to the benefit of the plaintiff; and a court of chancery gives effect to this equity, according to its forms, in several ways."

But if the court, by reason of other circumstances, is powerless to adjust and adjudge with final and conclusive effect the opposing claims of the litigating parties, so as to award to one what has been wrongfully given to another, then the mere circumstance that the official act of the executive authority is challenged for error of law or for fraud does not and cannot constitute the ground of an independent jurisdiction. It is only as necessarily incident to the proper decision of a case at law or in equity between parties regularly in court for a determination of their rights as between themselves that such questions can be discussed or decided. Where the whole force of the judgment is spent upon a mere declaration that the Act in question is void for want of authority, or voidable by reason of being infected with fraud, and it cannot consistently with known principles of law or equity go further by changing the relations between the parties to the suit towards each other, or towards the subject matter of the litigation, the case is not judicial. This is precisely the present case. Here a declaration by a decree that the decision of the register and receiver was fraudulent, and therefore voidable; that the action of the President in ordering the issue of the approved survey and plat by the Surveyor-General of Colorado, and its delivery in pursuance thereof, and the subsequent issue of the patent to Craig, were without warrant of law, and therefore void absolutely, does not decide the controversy raised by Leitensdorfer, nor settle and adjudge the rights of any of the parties thereto. Nor does it, as we have already shown, remove any obstacles which have been wrongfully and unjustly interposed by the defendant to the prosecution in another forum of the rights which the complainant seeks to recover. It is entirely inefficacious for any such result, because, as already intimated, if the acts complained of are, as complainant contends, void as being without authority of law, then they can have no legal effect whatever, and cannot be set up by the officers of the Department of the Interior as reasons for refusing to entertain and determine the appeals of Leitensdorfer from the decision of the register and receiver to the Commissioner of the General Land-Office. If, in point of fact, such a right of appeal is secured to him by the law, and the officer whose duty it is to hear and determine it refuses without just reason so to do, the proper remedy is by a writ of mandamus, and not by a bill in equity.

But it is shown in this record that Leitensdorfer, in pursuance of an interlocutory order of the circuit court, and as a condition on which the original injunction was granted, in June, 1877, made his application to the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia for a mandamus against the Commissioner of the General Land-Office, to require him to proceed with the hearing of the appeals alleged to be pending before him, and that his application was denied by that court; and he alleges that he did not appeal from that judgment, because he was advised by counsel that no appeal would lie from such a judgment; but this is not sufficient to confer jurisdiction upon a court of equity. We are not called upon in this cause to decide whether the judgment of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia at special term is or is not erroneous, nor whether an appeal would lie from it, nor whether by law Leitensdorfer is entitled to be heard before the Commissioner of the General Land-Office upon his appeal from the decision of the register and receiver. What we do say, and all we say, is that if he is entitled to such an appeal his remedy is not by a bill in equity.

For these reasons the decree of the Circuit Court is reversed, and the cause remanded, with instructions to dismiss the bill; and it is so ordered.

v.
JOHN WINTERBOTTOM ET AL.

Collector's bond, when suable—settlement, a bar.

1. A creditor of a county cannot sue a collector of a county, and his sureties, on a bond given to the State, conditioned to pay over all state, county and other revenue collected, and to faithfully perform the duties of such office, for a breach of the condition of the bond.

2. A settlement made by the collector with the county court for the county taxes, and an acknowledgment of the county court that he was fully discharged from his obligation in that respect, is a bar to an action by a creditor of the county on the collector's bond.

This is an action brought in the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Missouri against John Winterbottom as principal, and the other defendants as sureties, on a bond given by Winterbottom to the State of Missouri as collector of the revenue of the County of Knox in said State. No copy of the bond is found in the record, but the allegation of the petition in regard to the substance of it is, "That on the 30th day of December, 1878, said Winterbottom, as principal, and the other defendants, as sureties, executed a bond, whereby they acknowledged themselves to be held and firmly bound unto the State of Missouri in the sum of one hundred thousand dollars, for the payment of which they bound themselves, their heirs, executors, and administrators; that said bond was conditioned that said Winterbottom should faithfully and punctually collect and pay over all state, county, and other revenue for two years next ensuing the first day of March, 1879, and should in all things faithfully perform all the duties of the said office of collector according to law, and that said bond was, on the day last aforesaid, approved by the said county court."

The petition also declares "That by law it was the duty of said Winterbottom, as such collector, to collect all county taxes of said county in money, except that he was authorized and required to receive any county warrants issued by said county, when presented to him by the legal holder thereof, in payment of any county tax existing against said holder and accruing to said county; that he was not required or authorized to receive any such warrant from any one other than the legal holder thereof, and not from such holder except in payment of a county tax assessed against him; that the legal holder of a county warrant is the person to whom the same is issued as payee, or to whom the same has been transferred by one or more assignments in full; that by law all county warrants must be made payable to a person therein named, and no county warrant can be made payable to bearer, and any county warrant payable to bearer is null and void."

The petition also alleges that Harshman, for whose use the action is brought, was the owner of two county warrants, one for the sum of $3,315.05 and the other for the sum of $6,821.74, with interest, which he had presented to the treasurer of said county for payment, and it was refused because there was no money in the treasury out of which they could be paid. This fact was certified on the back of the warrants, which the treasurer entered in his registry of warrants as required by the Statute of Missouri. This occurred on the 18th day of March, 1879, and the petition filed June 18, 1883, alleges that no part of said warrants has been paid though demand had been made for said payment. It is then alleged that Winterbottom, intending to prevent any money coming into the treasury of the county out of which these warrants could be paid, had, in the collection of the taxes, received other county warrants in payment, and had thus collected and given receipts to all the taxpayers for their taxes.

This action of Winterbottom, he alleges, was an unlawful violation of his duty as collector of the county and a breach of his official bond. He then describes with more minuteness the particulars in which this conduct was a violation of his official duty, alleging that by the law the collector had no authority to receive any warrant in payment of taxes which was not originally issued to the man who offered it in such payment, or was regularly assigned to him, and that even such holder could only use it to pay his own taxes. The petition alleges a disregard of this provision of the law by the collector, who "did, during his said term of office, unlawfully and wrongfully receive from divers and sundry persons, in payment of taxes of said county, divers and sundry warrants of said county, the said persons not being the legal holders thereof, because the said warrants were in no case payable to such persons, and were in no case transferred to such persons by assignment in full, and said persons, not being entitled to pay the same in for taxes, because no taxes were assessed or existing against them; that said Winterbottom, upon receiving such warrants, gave receipts discharging from further payment the persons against whom said taxes were so assessed and existing, to an amount equal in each case to the amount of warrants so received; that from the 18th day of March, 1879, to the 1st day of March, 1881, said Winterbottom collected all the county taxes of and in said county in warrants as aforesaid, and not otherwise; that all the taxpayers of said county from whom any county taxes were due during said period have received from said Winterbottom full acquittances without the payment of any money, and without any payment except in warrants as aforesaid."

The petition then states "that the said Winterbottom, as required by law, once in each month during the said period, made settlements to the clerk of said county court of the county taxes so collected by him, and delivered to the treasurer of said county the said warrants so received as aforesaid; that the said Winterbottom, as such collector, and the said treasurer, at various times during the years 1879, 1880, and 1881, made settlements of their official accounts, as required by law, with the said county court, and the said treasurer exhibited to the said court, and filed with the clerk of said court, all the county warrants so received by the said Collector, and by him delivered to the said treasurer, and the said county court accepted and approved the settlements of the said Collector and the said treasurer, and approved the acts of the said Collector in receiving warrants in payment of taxes, as aforesaid, and ratified and confirmed the release and discharge of said taxpayers from payment of their taxes, as aforesaid, so that the same cannot again be demanded of them."

To this petition there was a demurrer, which being sustained by the circuit court, judgment was rendered for the defendants.

The assignments of error relate to this action of the court in sustaining the demurrer.

We are of opinion that the action of the court was right. While there are other reasons, perhaps, why this petition is insufficient to sustain the action, the two principal ones are: First, that the actual plaintiff, Harshman, for whose use this action was brought, shows no relation of contract or legal obligation, between Winterbottom and himself, on which he has a right to bring this suit.

Second, that the obligation of the defendants is to the State for the collection of the state taxes, and to the county for the collection of the county taxes. There are no state taxes in the case. The county taxes were collected and paid over to the county treasury in the class of current obligations of the county, which the law recognizes as valid payment of taxes, and the county court, to whom the obligation of accounting for the taxes collected, or for failure to collect taxes, was due, has settled with Winterbottom and accepted its own warrants issued upon the treasurer as a full and satisfactory payment and discharge of that obligation. This formal accounting and settlement between the county court and the defendant Winterbottom, as set out by the plaintiff himself in his own declaration, is one which the county court undoubtedly had a right to make; and, in paying over these county warrants to the treasury of the county, and in receiving the acknowledgment of the county court that he was fully discharged from his obligations in that respect, he presents a defense to this action which nothing in the declaration removes or invalidates. He had a right to receive county warrants in payment of taxes. The law in express terms declares it to be his duty to receive them. Whether they were received by him under the exact circumstances which the law directs, as to original ownership or assignment to the party who presented them, were matters for which he might have been called to account by the county court, and that body, in making the settlement with him, might possibly have had the power to reject warrants so received in making up the account; but, inasmuch as they were actual obligations of the county, payable out of the county funds, and receivable in discharge of taxes if properly tendered, the county court, which, by law, has full charge of all the financial operations of the county, could waive any such irregularity in the time and mode of presenting their own obligations, and credit the Collector with them in the account.

We are of opinion that this settlement with the county court is of itself a sufficient bar to the present action on the Collector's bond. If this were not so, and if, as the plaintiff's counsel contends, the payment of these taxes by the county warrants thus irregularly presented is void, then the taxpayer himself is not discharged. He had no more right to tender the county warrants in payment of his taxes, under the circumstances mentioned in the petition, than the Collector had to receive them. If the act is a void act as to the one it is a void act as to the other; and the right of the plaintiff to sue the taxpayer is much clearer than his right to sue the Collector, because the taxpayer owes his taxes yet, having never lawfully paid them, while the Collector has settled his accounts with the authority which had a right to accept these county warrants and has been discharged from further obligation. If he can sue the Collector on this official bond, and the sureties who are bound with him on that bond, why can he not sue the taxpayers? The obligation to pay taxes, and the obligation to pay the taxes when collected into the treasury, is the same and bears exactly the same relation to the right of Harshman to get his money out of the county treasury.

The truth is there is no contract or legal obligation of the Collector in that matter to Harshman. Harshman is a creditor of the County of Knox. He has no more right to interfere between that county and its Collector as to the manner in which that official shall discharge his duties, except perhaps in case of fraud or conspiracy, or by way of mandamus, than he would have as a creditor of any individual to interfere between him and his debtors. Where such things are permitted at all it is by way of a garnishee process or attachment, which is regulated by statute, or by a bill in chancery. The proceeding here has nothing of that character. The want of privity between Harshman and the obligors in the bond on which they are sued is established by the decision of this court in National Savings Bank v. Ward, 100 U. S. 202 [25: 623].

It does not appear that if all the taxes had been paid in money which the plaintiff alleges were erroneously paid in warrants, that when that money was paid into the treasury the relator would have been entitled to any of it. The discretion of the county court, and indeed its obligation to provide for the current necessities of the county, could not be interfered with by any one to direct the payment of this money to that particular debt. We do not see, therefore, that he was damaged, certainly not damaged in a manner which the law can recognize, by the collection of these taxes in warrants instead of money. East St. Louis v. Zebley, 110 U. S. 321 [28: 162]; Clay County v. McAleer, 115 U. S. 616 [29: 482].

The judgment of the Circuit Court for the Eastern District of Missouri is affirmed.

UNITED STATES.

Salary of consul at Tangier.

A consular appropriation Act, which transfers the office of consul at Tangier from the third to the fifth class, and reduces the salary of the office to that of a consul of the latter class, repeals all previous enactments which placed such consul in a higher class.

Submitted Oct. 17, 1887. Decided Oct. 31, 1887.

APPEAL from the Court of Claims. Affirmed.

The case is stated by the court.

Mr. George A. King, for appellant:

A statute fixing the annual salary of a public officer at a named sum, without limitation as to time, should not be deemed abrogated or suspended by subsequent enactments which merely appropriated a less amount for the salary of that officer for particular fiscal years, and which contained no words that expressly, or by clear implication, modified or repealed the previous law.

United States v. Langston, 118 U. S. 389 (30:164).

Messrs. A. H. Garland, Atty-Gen. and Ed. M. Watson, Assist. Atty-Gen., for appellee.

Mr. Justice Harlan delivered the opinion of the court:

This suit was brought by the appellant to recover from the United States the balance claimed to be due him on account of salary as Consul of the United States at Tangier, in the Barbary States, from July 1, 1882, to June 30, 1886. He entered upon the duties of that office July 19, 1870; was paid at the rate of $3,000 per annum up to June 30, 1882; and, thereafter, only at the rate of $2,000 per annum. He claims that he was entitled to receive the larger sum during the entire period of his service. The court of claims, being of opinion that the claimant had no cause of action, dismissed the petition.

The Act of August 18, 1856, regulating the diplomatic and consular systems of the United States, contained this provision: "That consuls-general, consuls, and commercial agents, appointed to the ports and places hereinafter specified in schedules B and C, shall be entitled to compensations for their services, respectively, at the rates per annum hereinafter specified in schedules B and C. * * * Schedule B. I. Consuls-General. * * * II. Consuls. * * * Barbary States: Tangier, Tripoli and Tunis, each three thousand dollars." 11 Stat. at L. 52, 54.

The same provision was carried into the Revised Statutes, section 1690.

The Act of June 11, 1874, making appropriations for the diplomatic and consular service for the year ending June 30, 1875, 18 Stat. at L. 66; Supp. Rev. Stat. 83, contained this provision: "That schedules B and C in section 8 of the Act entitled 'An Act to Regulate the Diplomatic and Consular Systems of the United States,' approved August 18, 1856, shall, from and after the first day of July next, read as follows: 'Schedule B. * * * The following consulates shall be divided into seven classes, to be known respectively as classes one, two, three, four, five, six, and seven, and the consuls at such consulates shall each be entitled to compensation for their services per annum at the rates respectively specified herein, to wit: Class one, four thousand dollars. Class two, three thousand five hundred dollars. Class three, three thousand dollars. Class four, two thousand five hundred dollars. Class five, two thousand dollars. Class six, one thousand five hundred dollars. Class seven, one thousand dollars. * * * Class III. * * * Barbary States: Tripoli, Tunis, Tangier.'"

The diplomatic and consular appropriation Act for the year ending June 30, 1876, 18 Stat. at L. 322, appropriated "for consuls-general, consuls, vice-consuls, commercial agents, and thirteen consular clerks $333,200, namely: * * * Class III. Barbary States: Tripoli, Tunis, Tangier." The effect of this Act was to leave the annual salaries of these officers as fixed by the Act of June 11, 1874. The appropriation Acts for the years ending June 30, 1877, and June 30, 1878, made no change. 19 Stat. at L. 171, 234.

But that of June 4, 1878, provides: "That the following sums be, and the same are hereby, appropriated for the service of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1879, out of any money in the treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the object hereinafter expressed, namely: * * * 'For salaries of consuls, vice-consuls, commercial agents, and thirteen consular clerks, $304,600, namely: * * * Class III, at $3,000 per annum. * * * Barbary States: Tripoli, Tunis, Tangier.' * * * And the salaries provided in this Act for the officers within named respectively shall be in full for the annual salaries thereof from and after the 1st day of July, 1878; and all laws and parts of laws in conflict with the provisions of this Act are hereby repealed." 20 Stat. at L. 91, 93, 98.

The appropriation Act for the year ending June 30, 1880, was the same as that for the previous year. 20 Stat. at L. 268. Those for the years ending June 30, 1881, and June 30, 1882, also appropriated an aggregate sum for consuls, vice-consuls, and commercial agents, keeping the consul at Tangier in "Class III, at $3,000 per annum," omitting, however, the provison—first put into the appropriation Act for the year ending June 30, 1879, and repeated in the Act for the year ending June 30, 1880—to the effect that the salaries for the officers therein respectively provided for, "shall be in full for the annual salaries thereof from and after the 1st day of July, 1878." 21 Stat at L. 133, 135, 339, 441. But the Act making appropriations for the year ending June 30, 1883, placed the office of consul at Tangier in the fifth class. Congress appropriated by that Act, "for salaries of consuls, vice-consuls, commercial agents, and thirteen consular clerks, $332,100, namely: * * * Class V, at $2,000 per annum. * * * Barbary States: Tangier." 22 Stat. at L. 128, 129, 131. Each of the appropriation Acts for subsequent years, covering the period here in question, contained the same language, keeping the office of consul at Tangier in "Class V, at $2,000 per annum," and differing from the former Acts only as to the aggregate amount appropriated for consuls, vice-consuls, commercial agents, and consular clerks; except, that the Act of March 3, 1887, contained the additional clause, that the sums thereby severally appropriated were to be "in full compensation for the diplomatic and consular service of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1888." 22 Stat. at L. 424; 23 Stat. at L. 227, 322; 112 Stat. at L. 480.

There is no foundation for appellant's claim. In United States v. Langston, 118 U. S. 389, 394 [30: 164, 165], we said that "A statute fixing the annual salary of a public officer at a named sum, without limitation as to time, should not be deemed abrogated or suspended by subsequent enactments which merely appropriated a less amount for the services of that officer for particular fiscal years, and which contained no words that expressly, or by clear implication, modified or repealed the previous law." The present case does not come within that rule; for the consular appropriation Acts for the fiscal years ending June 30, 1883, 1884, 1885, and 1886, while recognizing the division made by the Act of 1874 of consulates into classes, put the office of consul at Tangier in "Class V, at $2,000 per annum." In other words, during the whole period covered by the claim in suit, the consul at Tangier was in the fifth class, and there was in force an Act of Congress declaring that consuls of that class should receive $2,000 per annum; in other words, that sum should be in full compensation for his services each year. The only possible object of transferring the office of consul at Tangier from the third to the fifth class was to reduce the annual salary of that officer to the sum fixed for the annual salaries of consuls of the latter class. The error in the argument in behalf of the appellant is that he gives no effect whatever to the words "at $2,000 per annum," to be found in every appropriation Act covering the period in question. But, clearly, those Acts, placing this consul in the fifth class, at $2,000 per annum, repealed, by necessary implication, so much of previous enactments, including that of June 11, 1874, as placed the consul at Tangier in the third class, at $3,000 per annum. The argument to the contrary is not at all aided by the circumstance that the diplomatic and consular appropriation Act of March 3, 1887, for the first time after the passage of the Act of June 11, 1874, expressly declared that the sums thereby appropriated should be "in full compensation" for the services therein mentioned. That Act was passed after the decision in Langston's Case, and the words "in full compensation" were introduced therein, out of abundant caution, to preclude any doubt in the future as to the intention of Congress.

JOHN FINN, Appt., v. UNITED STATES.

Limitation of claim against the United States—court of claims—judgment thereof.

1. A claim against the United States must, except where the claimant is under a disability specified in the statute, be put in suit by the voluntary action of the claimant, or be presented to the proper department for settlement, within six years after suit could be commenced thereon against the Government, or it will be barred.

2. The general rule that a party making a defense of the Statute of Limitations must plead the statute, if he wishes the benefit of its provisions, has no application to suits in the court of claims against the United States.

3. A judgment in the court of claims for the amount of a claim which the record or evidence shows to be barred by the Statute of Limitations is erroneous.

Mr. Justice Harlan delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff seeks judgment in this case against the United States for the sum of $15,678, as the value of certain horses and mules which he claims to have purchased for, and delivered to, the United States, at their special instance and request, on or about October 14, 1863. He also asks interest from that date, on said sum, at the rate of 6 per cent per annum, until his demand is paid. The claim was never presented to any executive department of the Government until July 3, 1874, on which day it was filed in the office of the Quartermaster-General. That officer decided adversely to it, and transmitted it to the accounting officers of the treasury. It was disallowed by the Third Auditor of the Treasury, June 14, 1879, and in that ruling the Second Comptroller concurred. But on the 20th of July, 1886, the Second Comptroller ordered the case to be opened for newly discovered evidence produced by the claimant; and, on the 13th of August, 1886, the claim, with all the vouchers, papers, proofs, and documents pertaining thereto, was transmitted by the Secretary of the Treasury to the court of claims, under section 1063 of the Revised Statutes. The petition in the present suit was filed in that court on the 13th of October, 1886; and, after a hearing upon the merits, it was dismissed.

The Government contends here that the judgment should be affirmed, because it appears that the claim was not put in suit by the voluntary action of the claimant, within six years after it first accrued, nor presented at the proper department within six years after suit could have been commenced thereon in the court of claims.

The Act of February 24, 1855, establishing the court of claims, invested it with authority to "hear and determine all claims founded upon any law of Congress, or upon any regulation of an executive department, or upon any contract, express or implied, with the Government of the United States, which may be suggested to it by a petition filed therein; and also all claims which may be referred to said court by either House of Congress." 10 Stat. at L. 612, § 1. This Act did not authorize judgment to be entered against the United States, nor fix a period within which parties must assert their claims against the Government. The court was, however, required to report to Congress the cases upon which it acted, stating the material facts established by the evidence, with its opinion thereon. § 7.

But the Act of March 3, 1863, 12 Stat. at L. 765, enlarged the jurisdiction of the court, and, among other things, provided for an appeal from its final judgment, in certain cases, to this court, and "that in all cases of final judgments by said court, or on appeal by the said supreme court, where the same shall be affirmed in favor of the claimant, the sum due thereby shall be paid out of any general appropriation made by law for the payment and satisfaction of private claims, on presentation to the Secretary of the Treasury of a copy of said judgment," etc. The tenth section of that Act is in these words: "Sec. 10. That every claim against the United States, cognizable by the court of claims, shall be forever barred, unless the petition setting forth a statement of the claim be filed in the court, or transmitted to it under the provisions of this Act, within six years after the claim first accrues: Provided, That claims which have accrued six years before the passage of this Act shall not be barred if the petition be filed in the court, or transmitted as aforesaid, within three years after the passage of this Act: And provided further, That the claims of married women first accrued during marriage, of persons under the age of twenty-one years first accruing during minority, and of idiots, lunatics, insane persons, and persons beyond seas at the time the claim accrued, entitled to the claim, shall not be barred if the petition be filed in the court, or transmitted, as aforesaid, within three years after the disability has ceased; but no other disability than those enumerated shall prevent any claim from being barred, nor shall any of the said disabilities operate cumulatively." R. S. § 1069.

By an Act of Congress, approved June 25, 1868, 15 Stat. at L. 76, it was made lawful "for the head of any executive department, whenever any claim is made upon said department involving disputed facts or controverted questions of law, where the amount in controversy exceeds three thousand dollars, or where the decision will affect a class of cases or furnish a precedent for the future action of any executive department in the adjustment of a class of cases, without regard to the amount involved in the particular case, or when any authority, right, privilege, or exemption is claimed or denied under the Constitution of the United States, to cause such claim, with all the vouchers, papers, proofs, and documents pertaining thereto, to be transmitted to the court of claims, and the same shall be there proceeded in as if originally commenced by the voluntary action of the claimant. And the Secretary of the the Treasury may, upon the certificate of any Auditor or Comptroller of the Treasury, direct any account, matter, or claim of the character, amount, or class described or limited in this section to be transmitted, with all the vouchers, papers, documents, and proofs pertaining thereto, to the said court of claims, for trial and adjudication: Provided, however, That no case shall be referred by any head of a department unless it belongs to one of the several classes of cases to which, by reason of the subject matter and character, the said court of claims might, under existing laws, take jurisdiction, on such voluntary action of the claimant. And all the cases mentioned in this section, which shall be transmitted by the head of any executive department, or upon the certificate of any auditor or comptroller, shall be proceeded in as other cases pending in said court, and shall, in all respects, be subject to the same rules and regulations; and appeals from the final judgments or decrees of said court therein to the Supreme Court of the United States, shall be allowed in the manner now provided by law. The amount of the final judgments or decrees in such cases so transmitted to said court, where rendered in favor of the claimants, shall in all cases be paid out of any specific appropriation applicable to the same, if any such there be; and where no such appropriation exists, the same shall be paid in the same manner as other judgments of said court." R. S. §§ 1063–5.

All these statutory provisions are carried, with but slight change of words, into chapter 21 of title 13 of the Revised Statutes.

In U. S. v. Lippitt, 100 U. S. 668, 669 [25:749], it was held that "Limitation is not pleadable in the court of claims against a claim cognizable therein, and which has been referred by the head of an executive department for its judicial determination, provided such claim was presented for settlement at the proper department within six years after it first accrued; that is, within six years after suit could be commenced thereon against the Government. Where the claim is of such a character that it may be allowed and settled by an executive department, or may, in the discretion of the head of such department, be referred to the court of claims for final determination, the filing of the petition should relate back to the date when it was first presented at the department for allowance and settlement. In such cases the statement of the facts upon which the claim rests, in the form of a petition, is only another mode of asserting the same demand which had previously, and in due time, been presented at the proper department for settlement." "These views," the court said, "find support in the fact that the Act of 1868 describes claims presented at an executive department for settlement, and which belong to the classes specified in its seventh section as cases which may be transmitted to the court of claims. 'And all the cases mentioned in this section, which shall be transmitted by the head of an executive department or upon the certificate of any auditor or comptroller, shall be proceeded in as other cases pending in said court, and shall, in all respects, be subject to the same rules and regulations,' with right of appeal. The cases thus transmitted for judicial determination are, in the sense of the Act, commenced against the Government when the claim is originally presented at the department for examination and settlement. Upon their transfer to the court of claims, they are to be 'proceeded in as other cases pending in said court.'" See, also, Ford v. U. S. 116 U. S. 213 [29:608]; U. S. v. McDougall, 121 U. S. 89 [30:861].

We are of opinion that the claim here in suit —although by reason of its character "cognizable by the court of claims"—cannot properly be made the basis of a judgment in that court. As the United States are not liable to be sued, except with their consent, it was competent for Congress to limit their liability, in that respect, to specified causes of action, brought within a prescribed period. Nichols v. U. S. 74 U. S. 7 Wall. 126 [19:127]. It appears from the finding of facts that more than ten years had expired after the claim first accrued before it was presented to the proper department for settlement; and more than six years after the passage of the Act of 1868 (R. S. §§ 1063, 1064), which authorized the head of an executive department to transmit to the court of claims, for adjudication, any claim which involved disputed facts or controverted questions of law, or the decision of which would affect a class of cases, or furnish a precedent for future action. Consequently, in any view, this claim belonged to the class which, under the express words of the Act of 1868 (R. S. § 1069), were "forever barred," so far, at least, as the claimant had the right to a judgment in that court against the United States. The duty of the court, under such circumstances, whether limitation was pleaded or not, was to dismiss the petition; for the statute, in our opinion, makes it a condition or qualification of the right to a judgment against the United States that—except where the claimant labors under some one of the disabilities specified in the statute—the claim must be put in suit by the voluntary action of the claimant, or be presented to the proper department for settlement, within six years after suit could be commenced thereon against the Government. Under the appellant's theory of the case, the Second Comptroller could open the case twenty years hence, and upon the claim being transmitted by the Secretary of the Treasury to the court of claims, that court could give judgment upon it against the United States. We do not assent to any such interpretation of the statutes defining the powers of that court.

The general rule that limitation does not operate by its own force as a bar, but is a defense, and that the party making such a defense must plead the statute if he wishes the benefit of its provisions, has no application to suits in the court of claims against the United States. An individual may waive such a defense, either expressly or by failing to plead the statute; but the Government has not expressly or by implication conferred authority upon any of its officers to waive the limitation imposed by statute upon suits against the United States in the court of claims. Since the Government is not liable to be sued, as of right, by any claimant, and since it has assented to a judgment being rendered against it only in certain classes of cases, brought within a prescribed period after the cause of action accrued, a judgment in the court of claims for the amount of a claim which the record or evidence shows to be barred by the statute, would be erroneous.

CHESAPEAKE AND OHIO RAILWAY COMPANY.

Grant to railroad company—condition of—specific performance—purchasers at foreclosure sale—when not bound.

1. A grant of land to a railroad company, expressed to be on condition that if the land so conveyed should cease to be used for railroad purposes by the company, its successors or assigns, the estate thereby granted should revert to the grantor, his heirs or assigns, although signed by the railroad company, contains no contract or covenant that it will build its road through the land conveyed nor that it would continue it there.

2. If there were such a contract, the railroad company had the right to change its route before being built and to abandon it afterwards, and if the plaintiff is injured by this change his remedy is by an action at law for damages, and not by a bill in equity for specific performance.

3. Persons who purchased the railroad at a mortgage foreclosure sale did not thereby become obliged to perform the obligation, or pay the debts, of the railroad company.

4. In this case the grantor provided his own remedy for a breach of the condition in the conveyance, that the land should revert to him, his heirs or assigns.

Argued Oct. 19, 20, 1887. Decided Nov. 7, 1887.

APPEAL from the District Court of the United States for the District of West Virginia. Affirmed.

The case was heard in the court below upon the original bill and a demurrer thereto. The demurrer was sustained and the bill dismissed. From this decree the complainant appealed. The further facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Enoch Totten, for appellant:

The abandonment of the established line by the defendant Company was a violation of the contract rights of the appellant, for which he is entitled to relief in an equity court.

Mr. William J. Robertson, for appellee.

Mr. Justice Miller delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a bill in chancery brought by Charles B. Hoard against the Chesapeake and Ohio Railway Company in the District Court of the United States for the District of West Virginia.

The main object of the bill, so far as it can be ascertained, is to enforce specifically the contract set out in writing between the complainant and the Chesapeake and Ohio Railroad Company, which is made an exhibit to the bill, and purports to have been executed on the 28th of July, 1873. The first part of the instrument professes to be a deed of conveyance, whereby, in consideration of the sum of $1,000 in hand paid, the receipt of which is acknowledged, the complainant sold and conveyed to the Chesapeake and Ohio Railroad Company several pieces of land in the Town of Ceredo, in the State of West Virginia, which are minutely described, and which seem to be parts or parcels of land laid out in town lots by the plaintiff, through which it was expected the road of the Company would be located. This grant is expressed to be on the condition that in the event the property so conveyed should cease to be used for railroad purposes by the company, its successors or assigns, the estate thereby granted shall revert to the grantor, his heirs or assigns.

There was also a covenant that the complainant was to have leave and permission to connect a single siding or branch with the tract of the railroad at a point near the Ceredo Hotel, owned by him, and that the company would erect lawful fences and protect said tracks. There is no contract or covenant in this agreement, although it is signed by the railroad company, that it would build its road along and through the property so conveyed, and certainly no contract that it would continue it there, because one of the conditions is that if it should cease to use the road there the title to the land should revert to the grantor. Yet the main foundation of the relief sought in this action is based upon the allegation of a covenant in this contract, that the railroad company would build their road over the grounds designated in this conveyance, and the relief asked is that the Railway Company shall now be compelled, although they have for ten or twelve years been using the track through other grounds than these, to abandon that and construct their road through the lots mentioned in this contract and continue the same.

The prayer of the bill for relief is "that the Chesapeake and Ohio Railway Company be made a party defendant to this bill; that process may issue; that defendant may be compelled to answer the same; that the contract of 28th July, 1873, be specifically enforced; that the defendant may be compelled to permanently maintain, establish, and run its road through the Village of Ceredo, as specified in the contract, and to erect and maintain a depot and place for the convenient and regular receipt and delivery of freight and passengers in the Town of Ceredo, near Ceredo Hotel; that it may be decreed to pay to the complainant the sum of $1,000, with interest from the date of the contract; that it may be decreed to do and perform all and everything covenanted to be done and performed by the railroad company by the contract aforesaid; that the defendant may be inhibited, restrained and enjoined from all further proceedings in the condemnation case pending in this court in the name of the Chesapeake and Ohio Railway Co. v. Hoard et al. And after the answer shall have come in, and the cause shall have been fully heard, that defendant be perpetually enjoined, inhibited, and restrained from running its cars, engines, and trains over the complainant's land on the present location of their road, and as now constructed."

It will be perceived by this statement of the case that the defendant in this suit is not the Chesapeake and Ohio Railroad Company with whom the plaintiff made his contract, but the allegation of the bill on this subject is that the "Chesapeake and Ohio Railroad Company" was sold out under a mortgage foreclosure, and that the purchasers by virtue of the law of West Virginia became a corporation by the name of "The Chesapeake and Ohio Railway Company," the present defendant, "and entitled to all the works, property, estate, rights, franchises, and privileges theretofore owned and possessed by the Chesapeake and Ohio Railroad Company, and subject to all the restrictions imposed by law upon said last named company."

The bill also contains allegations that, while the first company never built its road through any part of the Town of Ceredo, the present Company defendant did build its road through that town, but selected a route somewhat different from that which embraced the lots conveyed by plaintiff to the first corporation; that afterwards the second Corporation instituted proceedings in the proper court for the condemnation of the land over which its line did run, which proceeded to a report of the commission ordered to examine and assess the value of the land taken, and the damages; that this assessment was reported at $1,075, in favor of the plaintiff in this suit for land taken by the new Company for the new route, and that this sum was paid into court. It appears that the plaintiff in this suit had notice of these matters, and, as the exhibits show, consented to the appointment of the assessors, but that after the report was made he objected to it, and demanded a jury. He also filed a pleading, in which he set up the contract already mentioned as a bar to the condemnation or taking of the property under the authority of the action of the commission. In this condition of affairs the case for condemnation was removed on the application of the Railway Company into the District Court of the United States, where, after some additional proceedings, the present bill was filed.

It also appears that the present defendant deposited the sum awarded to Hoard with the clerk of the state court, under the jurisdiction of which the condemnation was had, and that this money has, by order of the United States court, been placed in the hands of the clerk of that court, and that the defendant has built and been using its road over the property thus condemned for ten or twelve years. The bill also contains an allegation that the $1,000 recited in the contract as the consideration for the conveyance was never actually paid, although the deed acknowledges its receipt.

A demurrer was filed to this bill, which, on hearing, was sustained, and the bill dismissed, and from this decree of dismissal the present appeal is taken.

It is very clear that the bill presents no feature which justifies or requires the interposition of a court of equity.

First. The contract with the Chesapeake and Ohio Railroad Company contains no such covenant for laying the track of that company through the lands purchased of plaintiff as his bill alleges. Therefore, if even that company was defendant in this suit, there is nothing which the court could specifically compel it to do found in this contract.

Second. If there were such a contract, both the law and this contract contemplates the right of the railroad company to change its route before being built, and to abandon it afterwards, and if the plaintiff is injured by this change, the remedy is clearly by an action at law for damages.

Third. The present defendant, the Railway Company, is not shown to be under any obligation to perform the covenant of its predecessor, the railroad company, which is set up here as a matter of specific performance. The persons who purchased the railroad at the mortgage foreclosure sale did not thereby, under any statute of the State (Act of Feb. 1, 1871, Sess. Laws, p. 91), or any contract of which we are aware, become obliged to pay the debts and perform the obligations of the railroad company. Chesapeake & O. R. Co. v. Miller, 114 U. S. 176 [29: 121]. They bought the property of that company and its franchises; but if, as such purchasers, they thereby became bound to pay all the debts and perform all the obligations of the corporations whose property they bought, it would put an end to purchases of railroads. The plaintiff provided his own remedy for what has happened by the condition in his conveyance, that the land should revert to him, his heirs or assigns, in the event of which he now complains.

As regards the sum to which he would be entitled for the taking of the lots or parts of them where the railroad now runs by the defendant Company, the law has provided him with the remedy, which is still in the hands of the court in the proceedings for condemnation. If the money paid into court is insufficient, he is probably entitled to a further trial by jury. If it is a sufficient compensation, the money awaits him when he is ready to accept it.

The bill makes no case for the interposition of a court of equity, and the decree of the court dismissing it is therefore affirmed.

v.
GEORGE JEROME, Survivor, etc., ET AL.

Acts of trustee—foreclosure by trust company—binds bondholders—reforeclosure—parties—equities, how adjudicated.

1. Where a trustee acts in good faith, whatever binds him in any legal proceeding which he begins and carries on to enforce the trust, to which the cestuis que trust are not actual parties, binds them. Whatever forecloses a trustee, in the absence of fraud or bad faith, forecloses them.

2. Where a trust company began its suit for the foreclosure of its mortgage, and sold under the decree in that suit all the interests, legal and equitable, which it held in the land as trustee for the bondholders, and distributed the proceeds, all the rights which the trust company, as trustee, had in the land passed to the purchaser at the sale; and the sale not only binds the trust company as trustee, but binds a bondholder who has received his share of the proceeds of the sale, without complaint and without objection.

3. If the decree, or the sale under it, was in fraud of the right of the bondholders, their remedy is by a direct proceeding to set aside the sale or decree, and to proceed anew with another foreclosure of the mortgage, and not to undertake to reforeclose what has been fully foreclosed before under a decree which remains in force.

4. To such a suit, for foreclosure the bondholders are not necessary parties. They are represented therein by their trustee and are bound by the decree so long as it stands unreversed.

5. Equities, which were proper subjects for adjudication in the foreclosure suit, if they existed, and which formed part and parcel of the security which was then enforced, if not excepted from the sale, passed by it.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of the United States for the Western District of Michigan. Affirmed.

The facts of the case are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. J. P. Whittemore, Don M. Dickinson and John S. Seymour, for appellant:

The former foreclosure, decree and sale, created no estoppel to the present suit.

Koehler v. Black River Falls Iron Co. 67 U. S. 2 Black, 715 (17: 339); Fonb. Eq. § 11; Penn v. Baltimore, 1 Ves. Sr. 444; Massie v. Watts, 10 U. Even though the equity of the mortgagor had been stated in the former bill, it would have given the court no jurisdiction in respect of it, without Ayer being made a party defendant to that bill.

Sheldon v. Aland, 8 P. Wms. 110; Kennedy v. Daly, 1 Sch. & Lef. 376.

Mr. Walter D. Davidge, for appellees:

The case is one where an ultimate assignee of the parties of the second part utterly fails to show that as between the parties to the contract performance should be decreed. The alleged assignment created no privity between the subsequent assignees and Anthony.

Simms v. Guthrie, 13 U. S. 9 Cranch, 25 (3: 644); Mallow v. Hinde, 25 U. S. 12 Wheat. 193, 196 (6: 198); Findlay v. Hinde, 26 U. S. 1 Pet. 241, 246 (7: 128, 130); Waterman, Spec. Mr. Chief Justice Waite delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a suit in equity brought by Morris Richter, the appellant, and the case made by the bill and its exhibits is in substance this:

In 1864 the Portage Lake and Lake Superior Ship Canal Company was organized as a corporation under the laws of Michigan to build a ship canal from the most westerly point of Portage Lake through a neck of land, called "The Portage," to Lake Superior. In 1865 and 1866 Congress made two grants of land to the State of Michigan, of 200,000 acres each, to aid in this work, and both these grants were transferred by the State to the canal company. The company afterwards executed three mortgages on the lands so granted, to secure bonds amounting in all to $2,000,000.

On the 3d of March, 1863, Congress granted the State other lands, containing in the aggregate 220,000 acres and upwards, to aid in building a military road, called in the pleadings a "wagon road," from Fort Wilkinson, Copper Harbor, Michigan, to Fort Howard, Green Bay, Wisconsin. By the terms of this grant thirty sections could be sold at once, and thereafter thirty sections as each ten miles of road was completed. If the road was not completed in five years no further sales could be made, and the unsold lands were to revert to the United States. 12 Stat. at L. 798, chap. 104, § 3. On the 6th of May, 1870, this time was extended until January 1, 1872. 16 Stat. at L. 121, chap. 93.

In 1868, Francis W. Anthony contracted with the State to build the road, and in consideration thereof was to receive "all the benefits, emoluments, rights and interests arising from" the land grant. He was to have at once the first thirty sections authorized to be sold, and as any continuous ten miles (afterwards changed to two miles) was completed he was "entitled to apply for and receive a certificate for the number of sections granted to aid in the construction" thereof. In August, 1870, thirty miles of the road had been completed, and $47,958\frac{85}{100}$ acres of land were conveyed to him therefor in fee.

In November, 1870, as is alleged in the bill, about eighty miles of the road had been completed, and 153,000 acres of land earned, including that which had been patented, but Anthony had exhausted his financial resources and credit, and was in debt to the amount of $30,000. Being in this condition he went to New York to get money. While there, as is alleged, he entered into a verbal arrangement with the stockholders and directors of the canal company to raise the necessary funds to complete both the canal and the road, by which he was to transfer to Perez J. Avery, Alfred Wild, J. Edwin Conant, and William L. Avery, all his rights under the road contract, including the $47,958\frac{85}{100}$ acres patented lands; the canal company was to change its name to the Lake Superior Ship Canal, Railroad and Iron Company; the directors of the canal company, as individuals, were to subscribe $2,000,000 to its capital stock, and pay their subscription by their warranty deed of 200,000 acres of the road lands; and thereupon the canal company was to issue bonds to the amount of $3,500,000, secured by a mortgage to the Union Trust Company of New York, "to raise money for the Portage Lake Canal enterprise and for the wagon-road enterprise.

On the 25th of April, 1871, Anthony entered into a contract with Perez J. Avery, Alfred Wild, J. Edwin Conant, and William L. Avery, by which he agreed to sell to them, and they agreed to buy from him, all the wagon road lands at seventy-five cents an acre, to be paid for as follows:

"Thirty-six thousand ($36,000) dollars within thirty days from this date.

"Eight thousand ($8,000) dollars by the fifth day of June.

"Eight thousand ($8,000) dollars by the fifth day of July.

"Eight thousand ($8,000) dollars by the fifth day of August.

"Eight thousand ($8,000) dollars by the fifth day of September.

"Eight thousand ($8,000) dollars by the fifth day of October.

"Eight thousand ($8,000) dollars by the fifth day of November; all in the year 1871, and the balance in three payments; one of one quarter of the whole amount, in six months from November first, 1871; and one of like amount, payable on the first of Nov., 1872; and the other of one half the whole amount, payable on the first day of November, 1873; the last three payments to be secured by the joint and several notes of the parties of the second part, with the bonds of the Lake Superior Ship Canal, Railroad and Iron Company, at 60 per cent, assigned as collateral to said notes."

The contract of Anthony for building the road was transferred by him to the purchasers, "with all the rights, privileges, powers, and claims arising from the same," and he agreed to convey all the lands for which he then held patents as soon as the $36,000 were paid. The lands which had been earned and not patented, amounting, with those patented, to 150,000 acres, "more or less," were to be conveyed as soon as title should be obtained, and Anthony was to go on and complete the road and convey the remainder of the lands as fast as they were earned and he got title thereto. Upon the execution of a deed for the lands which had already been earned, but not then patented, the purchasers were to assign to Anthony, as security for the six monthly payments of $8,000 each, $72,000, at par, of the bonds of the canal company, he agreeing to surrender $12,000 of them as each monthly payment of $8,000 was made. Upon the conveyance of the lands which had not then been earned, but which were to be earned by the completion of the road, the purchasers were to execute notes for the price, in accordance with the terms of their agreement, and secure them with the bonds of the canal company, at 60 per cent on the face value of such bonds.

On the first of May, 1871, Perez J. Avery, Alfred Wild, and J. Edwin Conant, three out of the four purchasers of the lands from Anthony under this contract, executed a deed to the canal company, in which, after reciting that they were the owners in fee of 220,000 acres of land granted to the State of Michigan to build the road, and had subscribed for five hundred shares of the capital stock of the company, to be paid for by a conveyance of 200,000 acres of such land, they did, in consideration of the stock, convey to the company in fee simple, with full covenants of warranty, "all and singular those two hundred and twenty thousand acres of land, being the same granted by Act of Congress of the United States, entitled 'An Act Granting Lands to the States of Michigan and Wisconsin to Aid in the Construction of a Military Road from Fort Wilkinson, Copper Harbor, Keweenaw County, in the State of Michigan, to Fort Howard, Green Bay, in the State of Wisconsin,' approved March 3, 1863; which said lands are fully described and designated on the maps and record books of the office of the register of the land-office at Marquette, Michigan, and to which records and maps reference is hereby made for a fuller and more perfect description of said lands, saving and reserving from the operation of this deed twenty thousand acres of land, to be selected by taking the sections reserved in their order as they come, commencing at the Wisconsin State line, and taking the sections on both sides of said road far enough north to get twenty thousand acres of land."

On the same day that this deed was delivered, the company executed to the Union Trust Company of New York a deed of trust covering the two land grants to the canal company, "and also two hundred thousand acres of land, situate, lying, and being in said State of Michigan, subscribed to the capital stock of the party of the first part, and fully and particularly described in a full covenant deed made by Perez J. Avery, Alfred Wild, and J. Edwin Conant, and their wives, dated on the first day of May, A. D. 1871, conveying said last mentioned two hundred thousand acres of land" to secure a proposed issue of bonds to the amount of $3,500,000. Of this amount of bonds $1,300,000 were issued by the trustee to the directors of the canal company with the usual certificate of security thereon. The bill then alleges that the directors of the canal company and Anthony, upon the faith and credit of these bonds, raised in open market $36,000 in money, which was paid over to Anthony on his contract for the sale of the lands, and afterwards $16,000 more, which was used in the same way. The remainder of the $1,300,000 "were sold or pledged in the open market of New York and elsewhere, and money raised thereon and applied to the use and benefit of said Lake Superior Ship-Canal, Railroad and Iron Company."

On the 25th of May, 1872, a bill was filed against the canal company for the foreclosure of its mortgage on the lands embraced in the first congressional grant, and on the third of July, 1872, for the foreclosure of that on the lands in the second grant. On the fifth of July, 1872, another bill was filed for the foreclosure of the third mortgage executed by the company, which covered all the lands in both grants. Then on the 19th of June, 1875, the Union Trust Company filed its bill to foreclose the mortgage which was executed to that company May 1, 1871, and covered both the land grants and the 200,000 acres embraced in the conveyance of Avery, Wild, and Conant. The same solicitor appeared for the plaintiff in each of the several foreclosure suits. On the 27th of August, 1872, the canal company was declared a bankrupt, and thereafter George Jerome and Fernando C. Beaman, its assignees, became parties to the litigation.

In the bill filed by the Union Trust Company for the foreclosure of its mortgage, the issue of the $1,300,000 of bonds was set out, and the following allegations made in respect to the "wagon road lands," so called.

"That of the 200,000 acres mortgaged to the complainant, in addition to said 400,000 acre land grants, it is claimed that said company has no title, save to $47{,}958\frac{85}{100}$ acres, and that the title to the remainder has been patented to other parties. Complainant annexes hereto a list of said last named lands, to wit, of said $47{,}958\frac{85}{100}$ acres, marked Exhibit 'C.' "Complainant is informed and believes that said lands are worth about $3 per acre, or about $150,000; that said lands are known as the 'wagon road lands,' and were acquired from the State of Michigan by one Francis W. Anthony, and were conveyed to said bankrupt company mortgagee. Exhibit 'C' is a copy of the list on file in the office of the Secretary of State of Michigan, being certificate of purchase No. 1 of military road land under Act No. 20 of the laws of 1864, approved February 4. That March 4, 1873, Henry S. Wells, a bondholder secured by complainant's said mortgage, filed his bill in this court, impleading, among others, said Francis W. Anthony, said assignees, and this complainant, and sought by said bill to subject the said 'wagon road lands,' other than said $47{,}958\frac{85}{100}$ acres, to the lien of complainant's mortgage, and to prevent their conveyance by the State to third parties, and afterwards such proceedings were had that the relief sought was denied. That in article ten of a cross bill, filed by said assignees in this court September 13, 1878, said assignees state that certain stockholders of said bankrupt had contracted to buy lands to the amount of 200,000 acres, parcel of a larger amount granted by the State of Michigan for the construction of a military wagon road, and, assuming to be owners, had conveyed the same to the said bankrupt; that said grantors had acquired title to only about 49,000 acres, and only about that amount became vested in said bankrupt, and that the residue had been patented by the State of Michigan to other parties and lost to said corporation; and that said assignees made the same statement substantially in their answer to a bill by this complainant to foreclose said mortgage in the said district court, which bill was discontinued."

The prayer so far as it related to the road lands, was, "that said $47{,}958\frac{85}{100}$ acres of land known as 'wagon road lands' may also be sold; and that all the estate, right, title, and interest of the defendants in the rest and residue of said 200,000 acres of wagon road lands may be sold," and the proceeds applied to the payment of the outstanding bonds. The decree, which was entered March 18, 1877, established the lien of the Union Trust Company mortgage on the $47{,}958\frac{85}{100}$ acres of wagon road lands to which the canal company had title, and, as to the rest, found as follows: "That the title to the remainder of said wagon road lands passed from the State of Michigan to third parties, so that, as to the same, the said Union Trust mortgage covers only a possible equity, which equity in the residue of said 200,000 acres of wagon road lands, is also a security for said 1300 bonds." It was then ordered, among other things, that "the equity of redemption or other right or interest of said mortgagor corporation in the residue of said wagon road lands" be sold with the other mortgaged property, including the $47{,}958\frac{85}{100}$ acres to pay the bonds.

Under this decree the mortgaged property was sold in June or July of 1877 to Albon P. Man and Nathaniel Wilson, and this sale confirmed in due course of practice. Soon afterwards, Man and Wilson released to James C. Ayer, then in life but since deceased, the right to or equity of redemption in all the 200,000 acres of wagon [road] lands which had not been actually conveyed to Anthony, and by him to the purchasers from him, and by them to the canal company.

The present bill was filed on the 12th of July, 1882, by Morris Richter, as "the holder, as purchaser in good faith," of two hundred and thirty of the thirteen hundred bonds secured by the Union Trust Company mortgage, against the Union Trust Company, the assignees in bankruptcy of the canal company, and the widow, heirs, devisees, and trustees under the will of Ayer, then deceased. Richter had received on each of his bonds, from the master, the sum of $9 as his share of the proceeds of the Union Trust Company foreclosure. No other payment of principal or interest had ever been made. The bill charges in substance that Theodore M. Davis, receiver of the Ocean National Bank, being the holder of 910 of the various issues of the bonds of the canal company as security for a debt of the company to the bank of about 50 per cent of the face of the bonds, J. Boorman Johnston & Co., holding 200 of one of the issues of bonds as security for a debt of the company of about 80 per cent of the amount of the bonds and James A. Ayer & Co., of which James C. Ayer was the principal proprietor, holding 760 of the various issues of bonds as security for a debt of the company of about 50 per cent of the amount of the bonds, formed a syndicate at the instance of Davis, and "agreed to pool their bonds and debts aforesaid for the common interest of said syndicate, and to run down the value of said bonds upon the market, and to wreck the enterprise aforesaid." By the fraud and connivance of the members of this syndicate, as is alleged, "the legal title to the whole of said pledged bonds was procured," before May 27, 1872, "at a mere fraction of their face value." This being done, the syndicate, on the 27th of May, 1872, caused proceedings to be commenced for the foreclosure of the first of the land-grant mortgages, and on the 3d of July, 1872, similar proceedings for the foreclosure of the second of that class of mortgages, and on the 5th of the same month for the third. The bill then alleges that before these suits were begun the directors of the canal company had proceeded so far with negotiations for raising money for their enterprise that "a successful conclusion was assured on a basis of satisfactory title of said 600,000 acres of land being found in said * * * canal company, and on the value of said property being verified as represented by report of agents for that purpose, who had been delegated by foreign capitalists to investigate to that end, of which promised success the said syndicate having been advised, they, the said members of said syndicate, set themselves about thwarting the success of said negotiations, and accomplished their purpose" by buying over Anthony from his allegiance to the canal company under his contract with the Averys, Wild, and Conant, furnishing the money necessary to complete the wagon road contract, and getting the title to the unpatented lands in Ayer. This scheme was accomplished, and lands amounting in the aggregate to something more than 173,000 acres were conveyed to Ayer—153,000 acres in 1873, and the remainder in 1875. To induce Anthony to come into the scheme he was paid a bonus of $20,000 by Ayer, and furnished the money necessary to complete his contract for building the road. The date of this transaction does not appear, except, generally, that it was in 1872. This, as is alleged, prevented the canal company from raising money, and the syndicate, with the intent to secure to Ayer the title to the "residue of said wagon road lands," "enlisted the said Union Trust Company of New York in their designs, and procured the said Union Trust Company * * * to allow * * * Alfred Russell, the solicitor of the said syndicate, upon the retainer of said syndicate, to foreclose the said Union Trust mortgage in the interest of said syndicate, but with the understanding that such foreclosure should be conducted * * * for the protection of the aforesaid legal title to the said residue of said wagon road lands in the said James C. Ayer, as far as practicable and possible under the decree to be obtained therein."

The bill then alleged in substance that the suit for foreclosure was begun and carried on for this purpose among others, and that Ayer got the mortgage title to the residue of the lands under the decree in that way and pursuant to that understanding. And finally it was alleged that the decree rendered in the cases under which the title was got "was not, in fact, an adjudication of the said court upon consideration of the pleadings and proofs in the said several causes which, as appears by said decree, were heard and decided together, but was, in fact, a decree drawn by the said Alfred Russell, solicitor of the syndicate aforesaid, and submitted to by compulsion by those representing collateral interests therein, and assented to by the Union Trust Company of New York aforesaid in collusion with the syndicate aforesaid through their solicitor aforesaid, and by the said George Jerome and Fernando C. Beaman, assignees in bankruptcy of said ship canal company aforesaid, through ignorance of the rights and equities of the said last mentioned corporation against the legal title of the said James C. Ayer to the said residue of the said wagon road lands beyond the 47,000 and odd acres which were actually sold under said decree; and said Jerome and Beaman were actually misled as to the lien of the said Union Trust mortgage upon said residue of said wagon road lands by the collusion, neglect, and failure of the said Union Trust Company, in its foreclosure bill aforesaid, to make said James C. Ayer a party defendant, charging the legal title to said lands in his hands with a trust for the payment of said mortgage, and by the collusive concession in said foreclosure bill that the title to said residue of said wagon road lands had been lost to the said ship canal company and taken out from under the lien of said mortgage by reason of a grant thereof to third parties by the State of Michigan, whereby the lien of said mortgage had been lost, and hence the said Jerome and Beaman, seeing no interest which they could conserve by opposing said decree as drawn, and insisted on by said Russell, consented to said decree as proposed by said Russell, and said decree was entered accordingly by consent as aforesaid, and so it was represented to the judge, who allowed the same to be entered without opposition or argument or consideration, and it was signed accordingly."

The prayer of the bill is "that your orator may be allowed by this court to have the benefit of said decree herein set forth as 'Schedule D,' hereto, in behalf of your orator, and any other holders of said 1,800 bonds secured by the said mortgage to the said Union Trust Company of New York, who are bona fide holders of said bonds in said decree mentioned; and that in behalf of your orator and said bondholders the said residue of 200,000 acres of wagon road lands so deeded to said Jas. C. Ayer in his lifetime, as heretofore stated, may be by the decree of this court charged in the hands of said widow and heirs, or of said trustees, with a trust for the payment of the unpaid portion of said 1,800 bonds and interest thereon; and that the said residue of said land be sold under the decree and direction of this court to pay the moneys remaining due upon said unpaid bonds, or so much thereof as shall be necessary to that end,—subject, however, to the lien of the said widow and heirs, or of said trustees under the will of the said James C. Ayer, for all money advanced by said James C. Ayer in completion of said wagon road land contract, as the same shall be ascertained upon an accounting of the same, with interest, as the same shall appear upon an accounting thereof."

The Union Trust Company failed to appear, and as to it the bill was taken pro confesso. The other defendants demurred to the bill, and, upon hearing, the demurrer was sustained and the bill dismissed. From a decree to that effect this appeal was taken.

We are unable to find any authority for granting the relief which is sought in this case. The bill was not filed to set aside the decree in the suit brought by the Union Trust Company to foreclose its mortgage. On the contrary, the complainant asks in express terms to have the benefit of that decree, so that, as we suppose, he may keep the money he has got as his share of the proceeds of the sale under it. Neither is it sought to hold the Union Trust Company accountable for its alleged misconduct and breach of faith in the proceedings for the foreclosure of the mortgage. Nor is the suit brought to obtain a specific performance of the contract between Anthony and the Averys, Wild, and Conant, nor to recover back the money paid by the canal company on that contract over and above what was necessary to pay for the lands which had been patented to Anthony, and which were actually sold under the Union Trust Company decree for the benefit of the complainant and the other bondholders.

But it is, if we understand it correctly, a suit to charge the wagon road lands, now in the hands of the legal representatives of Ayer, with a trust in favor of bondholders as security for the amount due them respectively, subject only to a lien for the moneys actually advanced to enable Anthony to complete his contract for building the road and thus become entitled to patents.

There can be no doubt that the mortgage by the canal company conveyed to the Union Trust Company, as trustee for the bondholders, all the interest in the lands which was conveyed to the canal company by the warranty deed of Perez J. Avery, Wild, and Conant; but that was no more than the interest which those grantors acquired by the contract with Anthony. As their deed was with covenants of warranty, any title which they afterwards acquired under the Anthony contract would enure to the benefit of the bondholders through the trust company as their trustee holding for their benefit, and as their representative. All the rights the bondholders have or ever had in the mortgage, legal or equitable, they got through the trust company, to which the conveyance was made for their security. As bondholders claiming under the mortgage, they can have no interest in the security except that which the trustee holds and represents. If the trustee acts in good faith, whatever binds it in any legal proceedings it begins and carries on to enforce the trust, to which they are not actual parties, binds them. Kerrison v. Stewart, 93 U. S. 155, 160 [23:843,845]; Corcoran v. Chesapeake & O. Canal Co. 94 U. S. 741, 745 [24:190,191]; Shaw v. Little Rock & Ft. S. R. Co. 100 U. S. 605, 611 [25:757,758]. Whatever forecloses the trustee, in the absence of fraud or bad faith, forecloses them. This is the undoubted rule.

Here the trust company began its suit for the foreclosure of its mortgage, and has sold under the decree in that suit all the interests, legal and equitable, which it held in the land as trustee for the bondholders, and distributed the proceeds, the complainant receiving his share without complaint and without objection. All the rights which the trust company, as trustee, had in the lands at the time of the mortgage passed to the purchaser at the sale. That sale, it is conceded, binds the trust company as trustee, and therefore it binds the complainant as a bondholder. If the decree or the sale under it was in fraud of the rights of the bondholders, their remedy is by a direct proceeding to set aside the sale or the decree, and to proceed anew with another foreclosure of the mortgage, and not to undertake to reforeclose what had been fully foreclosed before, under a decree which remains in force.

But it is said that the original foreclosure was of no effect, because neither Anthony nor Ayer was a party to the suit, and the rights of the trust company and its beneficiaries under the mortgage were neither set forth with certainty in the bill nor found in the decree. No relief was sought either against Anthony or Ayer. The sole purpose of the bill was to sell the interest of the mortgagee in the lands, whatever that interest might be. To a suit for that purpose neither Anthony nor Ayer was a necessary party, because it was not important to them who held the rights that were to be sold, and such a sale would not affect them. The canal company, or its assignees in bankruptcy, were parties to the suit, and, instead of objecting, as they might, to a sale of the property without a more specific adjudication as to what was to be sold, consented to it. The bondholders were represented in the suit by their trustee, and are bound by the decree so long as it stands unreversed, and is not set aside or vacated.

The argument of counsel for the appellants seems to proceed on the ground that there are two equities growing out of the mortgage to the trust company, which may be dealt with in two separate suits as they are separate and distinct in their character. One he calls the mort-gagor's equity, consisting of the rights of the canal company in the lands growing out of the contract by Anthony for their sale to the Averys, Wild, and Conant. This equity, if we understand counsel correctly, it is conceded was sold under the proceedings for foreclosure, and now belongs to the purchaser. The other he denominates the "bondholders' equity," and it arises out of the purchase by Ayer from Anthony of his rights under the contract with the State of Michigan for building the wagon road when he (Ayer) had knowledge of the former contract under which the canal company could have perfected its title to the unpatented lands included in the mortgage if he had not interfered. Under this equity counsel say they now seek to recover for the bondholders "only the profits which Ayer made by stepping into Anthony's shoes in the premises."

We are unable to see how these two equities, if there are two, can be separated in the way contemplated. They both grow out of the canal company's rights under the contract between Anthony, and the Averys, Wild, and Conant. If the canal company could not recover from Ayer, neither the bondholders nor their trustee in the mortgage can. The title upon which their right of recovery rests, if such a right ever existed at all, was in the trust company, as the trustee of their security, at the time the original foreclosure was had, and it was part of the mortgagor's equity which was sold. It was then what this bill seeks to make it now, part of the security of the bondholders under the trust company mortgage, and being such it passed with the rest to the purchaser at that sale.

Something is also said in the argument about the equitable claims of the bondholders upon Ayer as the successor of Anthony, growing out of the false representations made to them as to the title of the lands covered by the mortgage when they paid the money and took their bonds; but all such claims come from the mortgage, as to which, in all proceedings for foreclosure, they are represented by their trustee when its interests are not in conflict with theirs. All the equities now asserted were proper subjects for adjudication in the former suit if they existed. They formed part and parcel of the security which was then enforced, and, not being excepted from the sale, passed by it.

This makes it unnecessary to consider whether there was such fraud on the part of Anthony as to charge the lands in the hands of Ayer, even if the trust company were now proceeding against him under the mortgage.

The decree is affirmed.

3. Where there had been a settlement of the demand between the United States and the company twelve years before, upon an assessment then made by a government officer, and a payment of the tax thus ascertained, held, that it was not error in the trial judge to express his opinion to the jury that, under the circumstances, and the acquiescence of the Government for that period in the correctness of the amount, they should not find for the plaintiff, he, at the same time instructing them that the court did not desire to control their finding, and that the question was one for them to determine.

Messrs. Thomas Hart, Jr., William Ward and Geo. R. Kaercher, for defendant in error:

The case cited from 9 Benedict is that of the United States against S. J. Tilden. The defendant showed that he had made returns of his income for the years in question, was assessed, and paid the tax assessed. The plaintiff demurred, and the question simply was whether the causes of action were barred by the facts of former assessment and payment. See page 387. The court sustained the demurrer on the ground that the former assessment was no bar to a subsequent action. The court simply held that the former assessment was not a conclusive adjudication upon the United States. The cases of U. S. v. Little Miami, C. & X. R. R. Co. 1 Fed. Rep. 700; *U. Mr. Justice Gray delivered the opinion of the court:

Trial by jury in the courts of the United States is a trial presided over by a judge, with authority, not only to rule upon objections to evidence, and to instruct the jury upon the law, but also, when in his judgment the due administration of justice requires it, to aid the jury by explaining and commenting upon the testimony, and even giving them his opinion upon questions of fact, provided only he submits those questions to their determination. Vicksburg & M. R. R. Co. v. Putnam, 118 U. S. 545 [30:257]; St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Vickers, 122 U. S. 360 [30:1161] The judge who presided at the trial of this action did not exceed his rightful power in this respect.

The action was brought by the United States against a railroad corporation to recover $40,844.19, for unpaid taxes on undivided profits from June 30, 1864, to November 30, 1867, under the Internal Revenue Act of June 30, 1864, chap. 173, § 122, as amended by the Act of July 13, 1866, chap. 184. 13 Stat. at L. 284; 14 Stat. at L. 138. The trial proceeded upon the rule established by previous decisions of this court, that an assessment is not required by the Act, nor, if made, conclusive upon either party, and that in an action to recover the tax the controlling question is not what has been assessed, but what is by law due. Dollar Savings Bank v. U. S. 86 U. S. 19 Wall. 227 [22:80]; Clinkenbeard v. U. S. 88 U. S. 21 Wall. 65 [22:477].

The president of the Corporation testified that in 1868 the United States made a demand upon the Company for some $350,000 alleged to be due for such taxes for the same period; that the Company resisted the demand, and through him as its counsel contended that it had already paid more than was due, and was entitled to a considerable credit for items really belonging to construction, though charged to income in the form in which its accounts were made up; that the Company opened all its books to the officers of the Government, and after full investigation by them, and arguments in behalf of both parties before the assessor of internal revenue for the district, occupying several weeks, the officers of the Company and the assessor agreed upon a settlement and adjustment of the demand for the sum of $39,797.61, which the Company thereupon paid, and for which it took the following receipt:

"United States Internal Revenue, Collector's Office,

"District of Pennsylvania, July 28, 1868.

"Received of Philadelphia & Reading R. R. Co. forty-one thousand eight hundred & seven $\frac{61}{100}$ dollars, for excise tax on—

"Gross receipts	$2,010 00
"Profits over dividends	39,797 61
"Total	$41,807 61

"May, 1868, being amount assessed on June list for July 1st, '64, to Nov. 30, 1867.

"JOSEPH G. KLINE, Deputy Collector."

The only witness called by the United States was an internal revenue agent, who testified that in November, 1879, he examined the defendant's books and accounts, the defendant giving him every facility that he desired; and that the result of his examination showed that the gross amount of the tax for the period in question was $85,532.60, and that, deducting an overpayment of $4,890.80 in 1869 on the "renewal fund," (which the Commissioner of Internal Revenue had since held not to be taxable), and deducting also the payment of $39,797.61 in 1868, there was $40,844.19 still due; that he made up the gross amount by charging the Company with the total receipts from its road, and with rent received from another corporation, and crediting it with all the working expenses, the "renewal fund," interest paid on mortgages of real estate and on bonded debt, dividends paid to stockholders, and the United States tax and the state tax on such dividends; and that he did not know how the sum of $39,797.61 was made up.

In the course of a long examination and cross examination, he testified that he made no allowance for interest paid by the Company on its funded debt, and that by his mode of statement the Company was taxed upon every dollar expended for interest, even if some of that interest was exempt from taxation; that where the Company paid a dividend to stockholders, and assumed the payment of the government tax on the dividend, he computed the dividend tax upon the whole dividend declared, and not merely upon the amount actually paid to the stockholders; that the fiscal year of the Company ended with November 30, and that, in computing the tax for the five months from June 30 to November 30, 1864, he credited the Company with five twelfths only of the "renewal fund" for the year ending November 30, 1864, and of the United States tax and the state tax on dividends, and of the annual dividend estimated as aforesaid, although, before June 30, 1864, there was no tax on surplus profits, and money spent in construction was not taxable.

Each of these points was contested by the defendant, it is not pretended that any of them have been determined by judicial decision, and it might well be inferred that they had all been taken into consideration in the settlement between the assessor and the Company in 1868.

The bill of exceptions further states that the Government offered in evidence "all the books of the Philadelphia and Reading Railroad Company, referred to, as well as the statements and reports, and closed." But it contains no description of those books, statements and reports, except as they are mentioned in the testimony of the internal revenue agent.

Such being the case on trial, the judge, in charging the jury, and referring them to the testimony given before them by the president of the Company on the one side and by the witness for the Government on the other, might justly and properly say to them, as he did: "From the assessment made by the Government's officer in 1868, the payment of the money in pursuance of it, and the acquiescence of the Government in what was thus done for so long a period—nearly twelve years—a presumption arises that the assessment then made was correct, and that the money paid covered the defendant's entire liability for taxes upon surplus earnings between the periods embraced. The burden is thus cast upon the plaintiff to repel the presumption by evidence that the assessment was erroneous, and, in view of the circumstances, the evidence should be such as to satisfy the mind fully in this respect." "Whether the Government has proved mistake by the testimony of the witness referred to—there is no other testimony tending to prove it—is for you to determine. In submitting this question, however, it is proper to say that, in the judgment of the court, it would be unsafe and therefore unjust to find error in the assessment and settlement under the evidence before you, and consequently to render a verdict against the defendant for the large sum of money claimed, as the plaintiff asks you to do. In other words, while the court does not desire to control your finding, but submits the question to you, it is of opinion that you should not, under the circumstances, find for the plaintiff."

v.

DENNIS W. MULLAN.

Pay of navy officers—when graduated.

1. One who, at the time of the passage of the Act of March 3, 1883, chap. 97, 22 Stat. at L. 473, and of July 15, 1870, chap. 295, § 3, 16 Stat. at L. 330, was a lieutenant-commander who had served as an officer in the Regular Navy, from Sept. 21, 1860, by continuous service in various positions, is entitled to the graduated pay given by the latter Act.

2. Where an officer has entered the service but once, that entry is to be taken as the last entry within the meaning of the statute.

This is an appeal by the United States from a judgment of the court of claims, for the sum of $356.08, in favor of Dennis W. Mullan. Mullan is an officer in the Regular Navy, who has served continuously therein since September 21, 1860, on which day he was appointed acting midshipman. He was appointed acting ensign, October 21, 1863; master, May 10, 1866; lieutenant, February 21, 1867; and lieutenant-commander, March 12, 1868. He was paid for all of his services in those capacities, in accordance with the laws in force at the time they were performed. In addition, he claimed to be entitled to the benefit of the provisions of the Act of March 3, 1883, chap. 97, 22 Stat. at L. 473, which reads as follows: "And all officers of the Navy shall be credited with the actual time they may have served as officers or enlisted men in the Regular or Volunteer Army or Navy, or both, and shall receive all the benefits of such actual service in all respects in the same manner as if all said service had been continuous and in the Regular Navy in the lowest grade having graduated pay held by such officer since last entering the service; Provided, That nothing in this clause shall be so construed as to authorize any change in the dates of commission or in the relative rank of such officers; Provided further, That nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to give any additional pay to any such officer during the time of his service in the Volunteer Army or Navy."

The court of claims held that Mullan was entitled to $356.08 under that Act. The amount is not questioned by the Government, if the court of claims decided the question of law correctly. Graduated pay for various ranks in the Navy was given by the Act of July 15, 1870, chap. 295, § 3, 16 Stat. at L. 330, now section 1556 of the Revised Statutes. At the time of the passage of the Act of 1883, Mullan was a lieutenant-commander, who had served as an officer in the Regular Navy from September 21, 1860, by continuous service; and, while he held the rank of lieutenant-commander, graduated pay was given by statute to officers of that rank and other officers. By the provisions of the Act of 1883, he is to be credited with his actual time of service, and is to receive all the benefits of that service in all respects in the same manner as if all of that service had been continuous in the lowest grade having graduated pay held by him since last entering the service.

It is contended on the part of the United States that the Act of March 3, 1883, applies to officers serving in the Regular Navy only when their term of service has not been continuous. The view is urged, that the expression "since last entering the service" implies that the officer, to be entitled to the benefit of the statute, must have entered the service more than once. But we think that this is an overstrained interpretation. Mullan entered the service once. It was his last entry as well as his first entry. Where an officer has entered the service twice, the second entry is the last entry, and that entry is to be taken in applying the statute to his case; but where an officer has entered the service but once, that entry is to be taken as the last entry, within the meaning of the statute. So, too, the expression, "as if all said service had been continuous," is not to be held to confine the benefits of the statute to a service which has been noncontinuous. The expression is satisfied by considering it as an extension of the benefits of the statute to interrupted, noncontinuous service, and by crediting the officer with the actual time of such service, as if it had been continuous service. Otherwise, the statute cannot be carried out. It says that "all officers of the Navy shall be credited with the actual time they may have served as officers or enlisted men in the Regular or Volunteer Army or Navy, or both;" and the benefits of such actual service are to be received, where the service has been continuous, in the Regular Navy.

The judgment of the Court of Claims is affirmed.

SMITH AND GRIGGS MANUFACTURING COMPANY, Appt.,

v.

DELIA SPRAGUE, Admrx. of LEONARD A. SPRAGUE, Deceased.

Public use of invention—when defeats right to a patent—burden of proof—patent for making buckle levers, how far void.

1. The use of an invention, by the inventor himself, or by another person under his direction, by way of experiment and in order to bring the invention to perfection, is not such a public use as under the statute defeats his right to a patent.

2. Where the substantial use is not for that purpose, but is mainly for the purposes of trade and profit, and the experiment is merely incidental to that, and such use is public, and for more than two years prior to the application, it will defeat a right to a patent.

3. Where the defense to an action for infringement is the alleged prior public use, for more than two years, of an invention, and where such defense is met only by the allegation that the use was not a public use because it was for the purpose of perfecting an incomplete invention by tests and experiments, the proof on the part of the patentee should be full, unequivocal and convincing.

4. Patents issued to Leonard A. Sprague, for improvements in machines for making buckle levers, as to certain claims are held void by reason of a prior public use of the invention covered thereby for more than two years before the date of the application.

The facts are fully stated in the opinion.

Messrs. George E. Terry and M. B. Philipp, for appellant:

As this machine was used by Sprague for more than two years prior to his application for the patents in suit, the 1st, 2d, 3d, 4th and 6th claims of the patent 228136 and the 2d, 3d, and 5th claims of the patent 231199, covering inventions embodied in and carried out by it while so publicly used, are void.

S. 340 (26: 821); Manning v. Cape Ann Isinglass & G. Co. 108 U. S. 462 (27:793); Henry v. Providence Tool Co. 14 Off. Gaz. 855; Perkins v. Nashua Card & Glazed Paper Co. 2 Fed. Rep. 451; American Hide & L. S. & D. M. Co. v. American Tool & M. Co. 4 Fish. Pat. Cas. 284; Lyman v. Maypole, 19 Fed. Rep. 735; Henry v. Francestown Soapstone Co. 2 Fed. Rep. 78.

The defendant is free to use its form of improvement upon the old machine.

The question to be determined in this case is, What advantage did the defendant derive from using the complainant's invention over what he had in using other processes then open to the public, and adequate to enable him to obtain an equally beneficial result? The fruits of that advantage are his profits.

Mr. Justice Matthews delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a bill in equity for an injunction and account based upon the alleged infringement by the appellant of letters patent No. 228136, dated May 25, 1880, and letters patent No. 231199, dated August 17, 1880, for improvements in machines for making buckle levers, issued to Leonard A. Sprague, the appellee. The defenses relied on are: (1) a denial of the infringement alleged in respect to the fifth claim of patent No. 228136 and the first and fourth claims of patent No. 231199; (2) as to all the other claims of both, that a machine embodying them was in public use for more than two years prior to the application for the patents. The application for patent No. 228136 was filed on November 11, 1879, while that for patent No. 231199 was filed December 2, 1878, the two being divisions of an application based on the same model. The machines described in the two patents, it is admitted, are substantially the same in construction and operation, both patents being for different parts and combinations of a single machine. For the purposes of this case, therefore, the date of the application is to be taken as of December 2, 1878, being the earlier of the two.

The machine is for making levers of buckles used almost exclusively on "arctic" overshoes. These levers are made from a single piece of brass, with slots through them near each end to fasten them to the strap of a shoe, and are bent by formers and swaged by dies so that they have what is termed a lip or bead, which bears upon the holding strap, two grooves within which lies the bar or pivot of the buckle, and two beads at the upper edge for a finish and to prevent the strap from cutting when it is fast through the slots and bears upon them when in use. There is no claim in these patents for the buckle lever itself as a new article of manufacture, for which, however, Sprague, the appellee had a prior patent dated May 27, 1862. The levers are made from a strip of metal by a succession of operations in the patented machine. The first step is to produce the slotted blank; the next, to bend it by doubling it upon itself into a U shape; the next, to produce the central double bead forming the grooves, and the next to produce the double beads between the slot and the edge of the lever. The machine is organized to feed a strip of sheet brass under punches which punch the slots in the blank, and then cut it from the strip; to feed this blank over a matrix where it is bent into U form; to feed it on to a mandrel, on which, by a pair of dies, it is partially formed, and then along that mandrel to a second pair of dies, where its form is completed. The machine is automatic, and while these successive steps take place in the complete manufacture of a single lever, all the various steps in the process, with respect to successive levers, take place simultaneously. So that as each lever is completely and finally formed on the mandrel it is pushed from the mandrel by another to take its place in that stage of formation.

The 1st, 2d, 3d, 4th, and 6th claims of patent No. 228136, and the 2d, 3rd, and 5th claims of patent No. 231199, are those in respect to which the alleged infringement is admitted, and as to which the defense of two years' prior public use is urged. These claims are as follows:

"1. In combination with the mandrel M, provided at its lower edge with the rib m and with the short ribs m^2 m^3, the dies N N′ O O, whereby, after the partially formed lever has been acted upon by dies N N′, the rib m serves as a support or guide over which said lever may be moved to a proper position relative to dies O O, substantially as set forth.

"2. In a machine for making buckle levers, the combination of the mandrel M, the dies N N′, advanced on planes substantially at right angles to the planes of the partially formed buckle lever, and the tongue n^2, attached to the die N, substantially as set forth.

"3. In a machine for making buckle levers, the combination, with the mandrel, the punch which punches blanks from a continuous sheet of metal, and two or more dies which successively form the metal into the desired shape, of a carrier which moves a blank from the punches to the forming dies and advances the partially formed levers against the preceding lever, substantially as set forth."

"4. In a machine for making buckle levers, the combination, with the matrix L and folder l^2, of the dies N N′, the mandrel arranged to receive the blank from the matrix, and the carrier, substantially as set forth."

"6. In a machine for making buckle levers, the combination with the folder l^2, of the pusher pin c^3, attached to and moving with the punch stock C, and a returning spring, which lifts the folder, substantially as set forth."

Of patent No. 231199.

"2. In a machine for making buckle levers, the combination, with the die which punches blanks from a continuous sheet of metal, of two or more dies which successively form the metal into the desired shape, and a carrier which moves a blank from the punching die to the forming dies and advances the partially formed lever against the preceding lever, substantially as set forth.

"3. In a machine for making buckle levers, the combination, with the mandrel M, provided with the rib m, of the dies N N′ and a stop adapted to engage with the lower end of the lever and determine the length of the bit u, substantially as described."

"5. The herein described method of manufacturing buckle levers—that is to say, by bending the blank into U shape, then forming the bit u and seats u^2 u^3, and subsequently forming the grooves u^4, substantially as herein set forth."

The claims in respect to which infringement is denied are as follows:

"5. In a machine for making buckle levers, the combination, with the mandrel M and dies N N′, of the springs N^2 N^3, to press the dies forward into proper position relative to the mandrel, substantially as set forth."

Of patent No. 231199.

"1. In a machine for making buckle levers, the combination of the mandrel M, provided with the ribs m m^2, of the dies N N′ O O, and a support, which presses the part u of the lever against the rib m, substantially as set forth."

"4. In a machine for making buckle levers, the combination, with the mandrel M, having rib m, of the dies N N′ and stops adapted to engage both ends of the partially formed lever, to regulate its position relative to the mandrel and dies, substantially as set forth."

It will be observed that the claims in respect to which the infringement is denied do not embrace the whole invention claimed in the two patents. They cover only certain definite and specific combinations of parts of the mechanism. It is possible, therefore, that a defendant might be guilty of infringement in respect to all the other claims in the two patents, and yet not infringe the three claims specified above. That is to say, he might use a machine which embodied all the combinations except those specified in these three claims. These he might entirely omit without any substitute, or he might have a substitute for them so different as to amount to a separate invention, and therefore not mere equivalents for them.

In the examination of the question, therefore, of the prior public use, for two years before the date of the application, of the invention as embodied in those claims in respect to which the infringement is admitted, we assume for the present that the machine used by the defendant is an infringement of that covered by the complainant's patents only so far as it is covered by them, excluding the three claims in respect to which the infringement is denied.

The testimony on the subject of the prior public use by the complainant is, that from the fall of 1874 until the fall of 1877, and thus more than two years prior to December 2, 1878, the complainant had in use for the purpose of profit in his business, operated in his factory by his workmen for the production of arctic overshoe buckles, a machine which contained all the elements and combinations covered by the claims in the two patents in respect to which the defendant confesses infringement. This machine was practically successful in that during the period of its use the complainant produced and sold about 50,000 gross of levers used on these shoe buckles, which he sold to his customers in the market. It was a public use in the sense of the statute and within the decisions of this court, inasmuch as it was used by the complainant in the regular conduct of his business by workmen employed by him in its operation, and in the view of such part of the public as chose to resort to his establishment, either for the purpose of selling material for the manufacture or of purchasing its product. It is claimed, however, and it was so decided by the circuit court, that this prior use of the machine in that form was not a public use within the prohibition of the statute so as to defeat the patent, because that use was experimental only, of an imperfect machine, embodying an incomplete invention, in order to enable the inventor to perfect it by improvements actually added, and to overcome defects developed by this use, which improvements are contained in the three additional claims, and which were added as parts of the invention within two years before the date of the application.

The matters under this head are stated by the learned judge of the circuit court, in his opinion contained in the record, as follows:

"The facts are, that from 1862 to 1868 the patentee made another kind of buckle from those produced by this machine upon two or more different machines. Between 1868 and the fall of 1878 another kind of buckle was made by one machine. For a year prior to the fall of 1874, he made the 'beaded' buckles—i. e., the kind now under consideration, upon two machines.

"In 1874 he ordered the skeleton of the patented machine from Bliss & Williams, his workmen or himself making the patented portions. This machine was in a condition in which it was used to manufacture buckle levers in the fall of 1874, and continued to be so used, without substantial change, until the spring of 1878; but it was not a perfected invention. It had two defects—one, that it choked, and the overlapping blanks had to be picked apart by a workman; another, that the bead was not parallel with the slot, because the blank could not be forced upon the mandrel evenly. Nevertheless, it was used, in some seclusion from the public, to make levers, and it made about 50,000 gross, which were sold; but the organization was defective until it was perfected in the early part of 1878, after repeated experiments. The inventor always adhered to the idea of perfecting the invention, and then obtaining a patent upon it. The two improvements which were introduced in 1878 were the springs between the levers and the dies, which prevented overlapping, and the rib m^3, in order to keep the blank in position when it was forced upon the mandrel. These changes, which are apparently not of great importance, perfected the invention, and enabled the inventor to take the final step between partial and complete success.

"It is perfectly true that a patentee cannot be permitted to use for profit a machine which embodies a perfected invention for a period of two years or more, and then obtain a valid patent for the old machine by means of the addition of some new improvements, which, in the language of Judge Lowell, 'were intended to benefit the patent rather than the machine.' Perkins v. Nashua Card, etc. Co. 2 Fed. Rep. 451-454.

"The present case is that of a machine which was imperfect, and which demanded and received the continuous experiments of the inventor to remedy the defects in its organization. It is not true that the inventor cannot safely use for profit such a machine in its imperfect state, lest two years should elapse during the experimental period before the invention is completed and the patent is applied for." Sprague v. Smith & G. Mfg. Co. 12 Fed. Rep. 721.

We think this view might be correct and applicable to the case if the invention of the complainant, which he sought to embody and protect by the patents, consisted of the entire machine as he ultimately constructed and operated it, considered as a unit; for, in that view, it would have been imperfect and incomplete, and merely experimental, until it had received from its inventor every element necessary to its operation. But that supposes that his invention is nothing less than the single, entire, and completed machine. We do not think that to be the present case. Here the invention is not one, but many; each of the claims in both of the patents is for a specific combination in a practically successful machine for making buckle levers, and each is a separate and distinct invention, and claimed as such. All the elements of these combinations were old; it was the specific arrangement and several combinations and sub-combinations of them that are claimed as new. The use of any one of these combinations, or of any number of them, in such a machine, would be an infringement of the complainant's rights as patentee. And if, without the use of the combinations contained in the excluded claims, the complainant had a machine practically useful for the purpose for which it was designed, which could be used with commercial success as superior to modes of manufacture previously in use, and which, in fact, he did so use for profit in the ordinary course and conduct of his business, and for the purpose of a successful prosecution of that business, it can hardly be said with propriety that such use was merely experimental, although during the period of its operation he was also engaged in the invention of improvements by which he hoped and expected to make it more valuable and useful.

A use by the inventor, for the purpose of testing the machine, in order by experiment to devise additional means for perfecting the success of its operation is admissible; and where, as incident to such use, the product of its operation is disposed of by sale, such profit from its use does not change its character; but where the use is mainly for the purposes of trade and profit, and the experiment is merely incidental to that, the principal and not the incident must give character to the use. The thing implied as excepted out of the prohibition of the statute is a use which may be properly characterized as substantially for purposes of experiment. Where the substantial use is not for that purpose, but is otherwise public, and for more than two years prior to the application, it comes within the prohibition. The language of section 4886 of the Revised Statutes is, that "Any person who has invented or discovered any new and useful * * * machine, * * * not in public use or on sale for more than two years prior to his application, * * * may * * * obtain a patent therefor."

A single sale to another of such a machine as that shown to have been in use by the complainant more than two years prior to the date of his application would certainly have defeated his right to a patent; and yet, during that period in which its use by another would have defeated its right, he himself used it, for the same purpose for which it would have been used by a purchaser. Why should the similar use by himself not be counted as strongly against his rights as the use by another to whom he had sold it, unless his use was substantially with the motive and for the purpose, by further experiment, of completing the successful operation of his invention?

On the other hand, the use of an invention by the inventor himself, or by another person under his direction, by way of experiment, and in order to bring the invention to perfection, has never been regarded in this court as such a public use as under the statute defeats his right to a patent. Shaw v. Cooper, 32 U. S. 7 Pet. 292 [8:689]; Elizabeth v. American Nich. Pavement Co. 97 U. S. 126 [24:1000]; Egbert v. Lippmann, 104 U. S. 333 [26:755]. In this last case it was said p. 336 [756]: "A use necessarily open to public view, if made in good faith, solely to test the qualities of the invention, and for the purpose of experiment, is not a public use within the meaning of the statute." In Elizabeth v. Am. Nich. Pavement Co. 97 U. S. 126, 134 [24:1000,1004], it was said: "When the subject of invention is a machine, it may be tested and tried in a building either with or without closed doors. In either case, such use is not a public use, within the meaning of the statute, so long as the inventor is engaged, in good faith, in testing its operation. He may see cause to alter it and improve it, or not. His experiments will reveal the fact whether any and what alterations may be necessary. If durability is one of the qualities to be attained, a long period, perhaps years, may be necessary to enable the inventor to discover whether his purpose is accomplished. And though during all that period he may not find that any changes are necessary, yet he may be justly said to be using his machine only by way of experiment; and no one would say that such a use, pursued with a bona fide intent of testing the qualities of the machine, would be a public use within the meaning of the statute. * * * Whilst the supposed machine is in such experimental use, the public may be incidentally deriving a benefit from it. If it be a grist mill, or a carding machine, customers from the surrounding country may enjoy the use of it by having their grain made into flour, or their wool into rolls, and still it will not be in public use, within the meaning of the law. But if the inventor allows his machine to be used by other persons generally, either with or without compensation, or if it is, with his consent, put on sale for such use, then it will be in public use and on public sale within the meaning of the law."

The only witness called to prove the fact of two years' prior use was the patentee himself. It is to be supposed that his statement of the circumstances is as favorable to himself as the facts will justify. It appears from this that he commenced making buckles under his patent of May 27, 1862, No. 35401, in the course of that year. The manufacture of the levers for these buckles required the use of three separate machines, one for cutting the blank with the holes punched, another for drawing it into a U-shape, and the other for pressing the U shaped blank into its final form on a mandrel. This continued until 1867 or 1868, from which time until the fall of 1873, he testifies that he made a certain class of levers in one operation, but that they were "not arctic." In order to make the levers for the arctic buckles, from the fall of 1873 to the fall of 1874, two machines were used, one for making the whole of the lever, "except putting on a bead on the tail of the lever;" this operation was performed by a second machine. While producing the buckle levers in this way upon two separate machines, the patentee states that he made changes in the mechanism with a view of producing the entire lever with a bead on by means of one machine. One change was, to put in an apparatus "to stop the machine when it worked imperfectly." Another was to put "a friction joint in the lever," that is, the lever of the machine, which he thinks he put in during the year 1866. The change whereby he was enabled to put the bead on, and which he says was made in 1870, or 1871, or 1872, he states was not successful. In describing the causes of the failure in this machine to produce the beaded arctic buckle lever he says: "One feature, it broke the levers that done the pressing, and, by not driving on to mandrel true, it would not strike it in the right place, and had to be sent back by customers." The result was, that in the year 1874 he abandoned the use of this machine for the purpose of making beaded arctic buckle levers, and constructed, in the spring of that year, a new one. This press was manufactured for him by Bliss & Williams, in March, 1874, and, as made by them, included the press, the main shaft, one of the levers, the lever for driving the carrier, the arrangement for working the levers for operating the striking dies, and the bed of the buckle lever machine was planed for receiving the dies and the working parts of the buckle lever machine. The other parts of the machine were made by the patentee himself and his own workmen. On the subject of this machine, the following is a portion of his examination:

"Q. 115. After carefully examining your patent 231199 again, please state wherein that machine, as it was used by you in the latter part of the year 1874, differed, if at all, from the machine described in your said patent and shown therein.

"A. The springs between the levers that worked the striking dies are in the patent, but were not in the machine, and this rib m^3 on top of the mandrel, which projects over the matrix to keep the U shaped blank down in position when forced on to the mandrel to keep it true and straight, was not in the machine. The point in the lower side of the carrier or driver is not in the patent, as I used the bar m^3 in its place. It gave me a great deal of trouble, and so I changed it. I don't know as I see a great deal more. I don't see anything more that I can describe.

"Q. 116. When did you put the springs between the levers and the striking dies in that machine?

"A. It was in 1877, in the fall.

"Q. 117. When did you put the extension of the mandrel, referred to as m^3 in your patent, in that machine in place of the point on the carrier to hold the U-shaped blank down in the matrix?

"A. It was either in January or February, 1878; I think it was.

"Q. 118. Did you use that machine between the fall of '74 and the fall of '77 for making buckle levers such as are described in your patent 231199?

"A. Yes.

"Q. 119. How many did you make during that period of time on that machine?

"A. Well, I must have made about fifty thousand gross, as near as I can come at it.

"Q. 120. And what did you do with that fifty thousand gross?

"A. Sold them. I might have made a few more and I might have made a few less; I can't tell till I look at my books; I could come nearer to it.

"Q. 121. Which of the figures of the drawings of your patents in suit illustrates these fifty thousand gross of buckle levers?

The witness further states that into the room where this machine was being operated people came at will, some to sell brass; others, people from the neighboring factories; and others to buy buckles; that the machine was open to their inspection; and in answer to the question whether an attempt was made to keep the operation of the machine secret during this period of time, the witness states: "From parties whom we thought were manufacturing buckles; we endeavored not to let them see them closely;" "not from those that we became acquainted with, and did not suppose would want to use any such machine."

In respect to the changes made in the machine in 1877 and 1878, and which are covered by claims in the patents, he further testifies on cross examination as follows:

"Q. 171. After you had completed the new machine in the way described in reply to question 115 in your testimony, did you have any practical trouble in its working?

"A. Not near as much.

"Q. 172. What had been the trouble up to that time?

"A. Forming the bead or telescoping or failing to drive on the mandrel.

"Q. 173. Describe what you mean by telescoping.

"A. The buckle levers, when the die formed the first impression onto the mandrel—the next blank from the matrix has to force that along, and it would spread open and go on the outside of the tongue formerly on there, and what I call telescope.

"Q. 174. Was this telescoping a real practical difficulty in the operation of this machine up to that time?

"A. It was, and gave me considerable trouble.

"Q. 175. Did you experiment from time to time to devise means to prevent it?

"A. Yes, sir.

"Q. 176. Now, about the trouble in the beading which you say existed up to the time when, in the fall of 1877, and in January or February, 1878, you made the change you have described. Please explain what the trouble was.

"A. One trouble was, that if it was not held in the right position in the matrix, it would go onto the mandrel one side longer than the other to match the ribs. It would not come in the center.

"Q. 177. What would be the result of one side of the bent blank being longer than the other when it went onto the mandrel?

"A. It made a bad lever, which was rejected by my customers, and consequently was lost.

"Q. 178. Did you have any trouble from the bead not being made precisely parallel with the slot before you made these improvements of 1877 and '78?

"A. Yes, sir.

"Q. 179. How did that come about?

"A. One cause that I have described, and telescoping, not being held in the right position in the matrix to be forced onto the mandrel.

"Q. 180. State whether or not it was a very delicate operation to make the head precisely parallel with the slot, and why?

"A. It gave me a great deal of trouble to do it. If it was not forced onto the mandrel evenly it would come that way.

"Q. 181. Did you have any practical trouble in any of these respects after you completed the machine in 1877 and '78 by the changes which you have described?

"A. Not when the dies and tools were in order—mandrel, carrier, etc.

"Q. 182. I suppose you mean that the parts were liable to wear and get out of order like other machines; am I right?

"A. Yes, sir.

"Q. 183. State whether or not it was your intention, while you were experimenting upon and improving this last machine, to obtain a patent when it should be completed?

"A. It was."

"Q. 187. State whether to complete the machine for making these arctic buckle levers with a slot and bead so that all, or practically all, the levers would come out of the machine with a perfect bead required the later improvements which you put upon the machine?

"A. Yes, sir; or I would not have put them on.

"Q. 188. What would be the effect of telescoping upon the machine itself before you devised the improvements which you made in 1877 and 1878?

"A. It would break the mandrel sometimes, and choke up the machine so that we had to get it out.

"Q. 189. In what way did you get out the telescoping blanks when the machine was choked?

"A. Stopped the machine, and took a pointed steel with a hook on and drew them back, and sometimes worked them off the further end of the mandrel."

On re-examination, he further testifies as follows:

"Q. 190. Did you ever have any trouble with the machine in choking after you had made the slight alterations you have spoken about, of extending the mandrel and putting in the springs?

"A. Yes, sir; some, but it was not near as much.

"Q. 191. What caused this choking, since those alterations—telescoping, or what?

"A. Sometimes telescoping and sometimes the blank not being cut smooth.

"Q. 192. In what way did you get out the telescoping blanks when the machine was choked, after it was altered?

"A. By stopping the machine, and using a sharp pointed hook, the same as before.

"Q. 193. Since those alterations were made, have you had any trouble about putting the bead on on account of the blank not going on the mandrel just right in this machine?

"A Yes, sir; when the matrix was worn and the die was worn, the die, not cutting smooth, will throw it around.

"Q. 194. Would the telescoping of the blanks, after the alterations were made in this machine, also injure the machine, and, if so, what part?

"A. The telescoping would produce the same injury as before when it did telescope."

Also, on further cross examination, he testified as follows:

"Q. 203. After your machine was completed by the changes of 1877 and 1878, did you have any practical trouble in forming the bead, or pushing the blank into the mandrel, or from telescoping, or from waste, when the machine was in good running order and in repair?

"A. No, sir; not any practical trouble.

And on further examination:

"Q. 204. Wasn't the telescoping that you have testified about, that occurred in this machine after it was altered by extending the mandrel and putting in the springs, a practical difficulty?

"A. Yes; one of them.

"Q. 205. What caused this practical difficulty after those changes were made?

"A. There was several. The matrix wearing, the dies wearing smooth, not holding the brass evenly upon the mandrel, and the end of the carrier wearing so as to not force the U-shaped blanks on evenly.

"Q. 206. And those same things caused the telescoping in the machine before it was altered, didn't they?

"A. Yes; and when the dies wasn't worn it would telescope."

The effect of this testimony, it is claimed by the appellee, is that "before the changes the telescoping took place when the machine was in order, the defect residing in the organization; after the changes it would only take place when the machine was out of repair." On the other hand, it is contended on the part of the appellant, that, although the patentee, on being asked the question whether he experimented from time to time to devise means to prevent the difficulty of telescoping which he had experienced, answered in the affirmative, yet "there is nothing to show that these experiments were made prior to the fall of 1877, and he is entirely silent as to what, if any, they were, and what, if anything, was done by him by way of experimenting. As the record stands, this machine was not changed or altered, nor was any experiment made with it or on it, during the period of some three years while it made over 7,000,000 buckle levers, which were sold. Sprague does not intimate anywhere that he made any experiments to overcome the objection which he said existed in the guiding of the U blanks upon the mandrel, at any time before he added to the mandrel an ordinary guide or rib, m^3, which was in January or February, 1878;" and that "the only testimony as to his intention of patenting the machine while experimenting is his answer to X-Q. 183, as follows: 'X-Int. 183. State whether or not it was your intention, while you were experimenting upon and improving this last machine, to obtain a patent when it should be completed? A. It was.'"

In considering the evidence as to the alleged prior use for more than two years of an invention, which, if established, will have the effect of invalidating the patent, and where the defense is met only by the allegation that the use was not a public use in the sense of the statute, because it was for the purpose of perfecting an incomplete invention by tests and experiments, the proof on the part of the patentee, the period covered by the use having been clearly established, should be full, unequivocal, and convincing.

The testimony of the patentee seems to be indefinite and vague. The question whether, during the period of his use of the machine, he was experimenting for its improvement, put to him by his counsel, suggested its own answer, which was in the affirmative, as also that respecting his intention during that time to apply for a patent. He gives no account of the dates of any such experiments, nor any particulars respecting them. He does not say whether more than one mode of overcoming the difficulties experienced was suggested and tried, or not; nor, if more than one device was attempted, what they were. The statements are meager and bald, and quite insufficient to satisfy us that the problem of perfecting the machine, in the particulars in which it was proved to be deficient, was one that was exercising the ingenuity and inventive faculty of the patentee continuously, with the ever present intention, during the whole period, to make an application for the patents as soon as he had reached a satisfactory solution.

In the present case, the use of the machine was apparently for the purpose of conducting an established business; the machine itself was the only one used for the manufacture, of which the patentee, by a prior patent, already had a monopoly. He alone supplied the market with the article, and the whole demand was satisfactorily met by this single machine. To this extent, it operated successfully. That it was capable of improvement need not be denied, nor that, while it was in daily use, its owner and inventor watched it with the view of devising means to meet and overcome imperfections in its operation; but this much can be said in every such case. There are few machines, probably, which are not susceptible of further development and improvement, and the ingenuity of mechanics and inventors is commonly on the alert to discover defects and invent remedies. The alterations made in the machine in question, however useful, were not vital to its organization. Without them, it could and did work so as to be commercially successful.

The impression made upon us by the evidence, the conclusion from which we cannot resist, is, that the patentee unduly neglected and delayed to make his application for the patents, and deprived himself of his right thereto by the public use of the machine in question, so far as it is embodied in the claims under discussion.

The proof falls far short of establishing that the main purpose in view, in the use of the machine by the patentee, prior to his application, was to perfect its mechanism and improve its operation. On the contrary, it seems to us that it shows that the real purpose in the use was to conduct the business of the manufacture, the improvement and perfection of the machine being merely incidental and subsidiary.

The case upon the proofs seems to us to fall within the principle of the decision of this court in Hall v. Macneale, 107 U. S. 90, 97 [27: 367, 369]. It was there said: "It is contended that the safes were experimental and that the use was a use for experiment. But we are of opinion that this was not so, and that the case falls within the principle laid down by this court in Coffin v. Ogden, 85 U. S. 18 Wall. 120 [21: 821]. The invention was complete in those safes. It was capable of producing the results sought to be accomplished, though not as thoroughly as with the use of welded steel and iron plates. The construction and arrangement and purpose and mode of operation and use of the bolts in the safes were necessarily known to the workmen who put them in. They were, it is true, hidden from view, after the safes were completed, and it required a destruction of the safes to bring them into view. But this was no concealment of them or use of them in secret. They had no more concealment than was inseparable from any legitimate use of them. As to the use being experimental, it is not shown that any attempt was made to see if the plates of the safe could be stripped off, and thus to prove whether or not the conical bolts were efficient."

It follows that patent No. 228136, to the extent of the 1st, 2d, 3d, 4th, and 6th claims, and patent No. 231199, in respect to the 2d, 3d, and 5th claims, must be held void by reason of a prior public use of the invention covered thereby for more than two years before the date of the application. In respect to the alleged infringement of the 5th claim of patent No. 228136, and the 1st and 4th claims of patent No. 231199, we agree with the conclusions of the circuit court for the reasons stated in its opinion, which it is not necessary here to repeat. Sprague v. Smith & Griggs Mfg. Co. 12 Fed. Rep. 721.

As we find the decree of the Circuit Court to be erroneous in respect to the other claims, it must be reversed, and the cause remanded, with instructions to take further proceedings therein, in conformity with this opinion; and it is so ordered.

ROBERT W. ALLEN.

Pay of navy officer—allowances by General Order of 1866.

1. A paymaster in the Navy is not entitled in the settlement of his accounts, under the Act of March 3, 1883, 22 Stat. at L. 473, to the longevity increment on his 33½ per cent of salary allowed in lieu of fuel, quarters, etc., under Navy General Order No. 75, of May 23, 1866.

2. The allowances provided for in the General Order of 1866 are to be ascertained by reference to the amount statedly received by the officer as statutory pay at the time such general order was in force, and are not to be increased by the additional compensation allowed by the Act of 1883.

Submitted Oct. 26, 1887. Decided Nov 7, 1887.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Court of Claims, rendered in favor of Robert W. Allen, the claimant, for the sum of $1,818.79. Reversed.

Claimant is a paymaster in the Navy, and has been since 1868. In the adjustment of his claim for benefits accruing to him under the clause in the Naval Appropriation Act of 1883, known as the Longevity Pay Act, 23 Stat. at L. 473, the sum of $1,112.75, being the amount paid him under General Order No. 75, issued by the Secretary of the Navy, May 23, 1866, was deducted from the settlement made in his favor.

Messrs. A. H. Garland, Atty-Gen., Robert A. Howard, Assist. Atty-Gen., and F. P. Dewees, for appellant:

This deduction, in view of the decision in U. S. v. Philbrick, 120 U. S. 52 (30:559) was erroneous. The judgment, therefore, of the court below to the amount of $1,112.75 is not disputed. But it is contended by claimant that the allowance for commutation of quarters, etc., under General Order No. 75, was part of the pay of officers of the Navy, and that, as he is entitled to the benefits of the Longevity Pay Act of March 3, 1883, the further sum of $206.04 would have accrued to him under such general order when in force, had he at that time been credited with his prior service. That is to say, it is claimed that the percentage of pay allowed as commutation for quarters, etc., under said general order should be made, not upon the pay actually received by claimant under existing laws at the time the payment was made and the order in force, but also upon the increased pay which he has since been allowed under the Longevity Pay Act of 1883, upon which basis the further sum alleged to be due claimant would be, according to the calculation of the accounting officers of the treasury, $206.04. Parallel facts were before this court in the case of Philbrick v. U. S. 21 Ct. Cl. 511; U. S. v. Philbrick, supra.

The allowance for commutation of quarters, etc., was no part of the pay of naval officers. The pay of naval officers is fixed by statute. The Secretary of the Navy has no power to increase or diminish it. The powers of all officers from the President down are limited by law.

The question in this case is whether appellee is entitled, in the settlement of his account under what is known as the longevity-pay clause of section 1 of the Naval Appropriation Act of March 3, 1883, 22 Stat. at L. 478, to the longevity increment on his 33⅓ per cent of salary allowed in lieu of fuel, quarters, etc., under Navy General Order No. 75, of May 23, 1866. The case, so far as it goes, is identical with that of the United States v. Philbrick, in which the judgment of the court of claims was affirmed by this court. 120 U. S. 52 (30:559).

The appellee is a paymaster in the Navy, having served in that capacity since February 1, 1868. In the adjustment of his claim for the benefits of what is known as the Longevity Act of March 3, 1883, 22 Stat. at L. 478, the accounting officers of the treasury deducted the sum of $1,112.75, the amount paid the claimant under General Order No. 75, issued by the Secretary of the Navy, under date of May 23, 1866, in relation to allowances "for rent of quarters, or to pay rent for furniture, or for lights and fuel," etc. The object of the order, as appears upon its face, was to establish a fixed rate of compensation in lieu of the extra allowances prohibited by the Act of March 3, 1835, 4 Stat at L. 753, which last Act was repealed by that of April 17, 1866, 14 Stat at L. 33, 38. That order made an allowance to officers, not provided with quarters on shore stations, of "a sum equal to 33⅓ per centum of their pay in lieu of all allowances, except for mileage and traveling expenses under orders; and those provided with such quarters, 20 per centum of their pay in lieu of said allowances." It also stated: "The Act of March 3, 1865, having increased the pay of midshipmen and mates, the allowances hereby authorized will not be extended to them."

The findings of fact further state that "said accounting officers refused, in the settlement of said claim [under the Act of 1883], to allow claimant the further sum of $206.04, which said amount would have accrued to him if he had been credited, at that time, with his service prior to the date of his commission as paymaster." The court below, following the decision in United States v. Philbrick, 120 U. S. 52 [30: 559], which sustained the validity of the said general order, held the deduction of $1,112.75 to be unauthorized by law; and, without considering the merits of the question made as to the item of $206.04, adjudged—upon the ground that, in its opinion, the decision in Philbrick's Case required it to be done—that the appellee should also have been allowed the latter sum in the settlement of his claim under the Act of 1883.

It is possible that the findings in Philbrick's Case, although very meager and obscure, involved the question now presented. But no such point was suggested by counsel, and it was not considered by this court. The only question actually disputed in that case was as to the validity of General Order No. 75; and this court was led to believe that if that order was sustained as a proper exercise of authority by the Secretary of the Navy, the affirmance of the judgment below would follow as a matter of course.

We are not at all certain from the pleadings and findings in the present case what is the precise question raised in respect to the item of $206.04. The Act of March 3, 1883, provides that "All officers of the Navy shall be credited with the actual time they may have served as officers or enlisted men in the Regular or Volunteer Army or Navy, or both, and shall receive all the benefits of such actual service, in all respects, in the same manner as if all said service had been continuous and in the Regular Navy in the lowest grade having graduated pay held by such officer since last entering the service: Provided, That nothing in this clause shall be so construed as to authorize any change in the dates of commission or in the relative rank of such officers; Provided further, That nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to give any additional pay to any such officer during the time of his service in the Volunteer Army or Navy." 22 Stat. at L. 478, chap. 97. The question which counsel for the appellee contend is presented by the record is, whether appellee is entitled, in the settlement of his account under the Act of 1883, "to the longevity increment on his 33⅓ per cent of salary allowed in lieu of fuel, quarters, etc., under Navy General Order No. 75, of May 23, 1866." It is perfectly clear, they argue, that if the Act of 1883 had been in force in 1866, the salary of appellee would have been larger than it actually was by reason of the credit for prior service, which the Act of 1883 now directs to be given to them; that is, their salaries being larger, the 33⅓ per cent allowance would have been correspondingly larger, and they should now receive the difference in that item.

We do not concur in this interpretation of the statute. The allowances provided for in the General Order of 1866 were made pursuant to rules and regulations established for the apportionment from time to time of sums appropriated in gross by Congress for specific objects connected with the naval service. They constituted no part of the pay proper of officers, and were designed to meet certain expenses they would necessarily incur in the discharge of their duties. The secretary used their regular pay simply as a basis upon which to calculate the percentage allowed for commutation of quarters, etc. That percentage is to be ascertained by reference to the amount statedly received by the officer, as statutory pay, at the time General Order No. 75 was in force, and is not to be increased by the additional compensation allowed by the Act of 1883, as the result of giving him the benefits of actual service, as if it "had been continuous and in the Regular Navy in the lowest grade having graduated pay held by such officer since last entering the service."

These views lead to a reversal, with directions to enter judgment in favor of the claimant, only for the sum of $1,112.75. It is so ordered.

MANISTEE RIVER IMPROVEMENT COMPANY.

Organization of company—exaction of tolls—authority of State—Ordinance of 1787.

1. The Statute of the State of Michigan, under which the Manistee River Improvement Company was organized, is not in conflict with the Constitution of the United States.

2. The exaction of tolls, under a statute, for the use of an improved water way, is not a deprivation of property within the meaning of the clause in the Constitution that no State shall deprive a person of property without due process of law. There is no analogy between the imposition of taxes and the levying of tolls for improvement of highways.

3. A State can authorize any improvement of a river wholly within its limits, which, in its judgment will enhance its value as a means of transportation from one part of the State to another, if the free navigation of the river, as permitted under the laws of the United States, is not impaired, or any system for the improvement of its navigation provided by the General Government is not defeated; and to meet the costs of such improvement the State may levy a general tax or lay a reasonable toll upon all who use the river as improved.

4. There was no contract in the fourth article of the Ordinance of 1787, respecting the freedom of the navigable waters of the territory northwest of the Ohio River emptying into the St. Lawrence, which bound the people of the territory or of any portion of it when subsequently formed into a State, and admitted into the Union, nor anything in said article which would prevent the State from authorizing the improvement made in the navigation of the Manistee River.

Argued Oct. 31, 1887. Decided Nov. 14, 1887.

Reported below, 58 Mich. 593.

Statement by Mr Justice Field:

The plaintiff below is a corporation organized, under a Statute of Michigan, for the improvement of Manistee River, a stream wholly within that State. The present action was brought to collect from the defendant the amount of tolls levied for the use, in the years 1878, 1879, 1880, and 1881, of the river as improved. The improvements consisted in the removal of obstacles to the floating of logs and lumber down the stream, principally by cutting new channels at different points, and by confining the waters at other points by embankments. The statute under which the plaintiff below was organized contains various provisions to secure a careful consideration of the improvements proposed, of their alleged benefit to the public, and, if adopted, of their proper construction, and of the tolls to be charged for their use. The company must first obtain the assent of the Governor and of the Attorney-General to the proposed improvements, and then submit to the Board of Control designated a map of the sections of the stream which it proposes to improve, and plans showing the nature and character of the improvements. If, in the opinion of the board, the construction of the proposed improvements will be a public benefit, and the company is a proper one to make them, the board is required to endorse its approval upon the map and plans, give the consent of the State to their construction, and fix the time for their completion. Upon such approval, the corporation is authorized to make the improvements; and, whenever they have been completed to the satisfaction of the Board of Control, and accepted, that body is to fix the rates of toll which the company may charge for running vessels, boats, rafts, timber, logs, or lumber through the improved stream. These rates are to be graduated with reference to the distance run upon the river, and are not to be increased or changed without the consent of the board, and cannot be increased at any time so that they will amount to more than 15 per cent of the cost of the improvements after deducting necessary expenses and repairs. The collection of tolls is to be confined strictly to that part of the river improved, and to the floatable material benefited by the improvements. The streams improved under the statute are to be open to all persons for the passage of vessels, boats, logs, rafts, timber, and lumber, upon payment of the prescribed tolls; and uniform rates are to be charged.

The declaration alleges a compliance by the plaintiff below with the requirements of the statute in its incorporation; in obtaining the consent of the Governor and of the Attorney-General of the State to its proposed improvement of Manistee River; in submitting to the Board of Control the maps and plans of the improvements; in obtaining its opinion that their construction, as thus shown, would be a public benefit; that the plaintiff was a proper company to make the improvements; and, also, its consent to the same on behalf of the State, and its designation of the time within which they were to be constructed. The declaration also sets forth that the improvements were made pursuant to the plans and within the time required, with such changes and exceptions as were authorized by the board under the statute, and that when they were completed and accepted, that body fixed the rates of toll for the use of the river as improved, in running logs and timber for the years 1879 to 1881, inclusive, those rates varying from five to fifteen cents per thousand feet, board measure, according to the distance that the logs were to run through different sections of the improved stream; that, during the years mentioned, the defendant below floated down the river, through the portions improved, seventy-eight million seven hundred and eleven thousand feet of logs, board measure, and became liable for the tolls fixed upon them, amounting to $9,253, to recover which the present action was brought.

The defendant pleaded the general issue, and gave notice of several special defenses. On the trial, the plaintiff established the matters alleged by him in the declaration, but the evidence offered by the defendant only tended to show that the measurement of the logs was excessive, and that the tolls receivable were less by 10 per cent than the amount claimed.

The defendant, however, contended, and requested the court to instruct the jury in substance as follows:

First. That the statute of the State, under which the plaintiff was organized and the tolls were fixed, is in conflict with the clause of the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which declares that no State shall deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, in authorizing the Board of Control to fix the rates of toll without notice to the parties interested, or affording them any opportunity of contesting the validity or propriety of such tolls, either in the first instance or afterwards.

Second. That the statute in authorizing the improvements of rivers and the collection of tolls for them is in conflict with the clause of the Constitution of the United States which declares that no State shall pass any law impairing the obligation of contracts, in that it impairs the contract contained in the Ordinance of 1787, "for the government of the territory of the United States northwest of the River Ohio," giving to the people of that territory the right to the free use of the navigable waters leading into the St. Lawrence, without any tax, impost, or duty therefor. The fourth article of that ordinance declares that "The navigable waters leading into the Mississippi and Saint Lawrence, and the carrying places between the same, shall be common highways and forever free, as well to the inhabitants of the said territory as to the citizens of the United States, and those of any other States that may be admitted into the confederacy without any tax, impost, or duty therefor." But the court refused to give these instructions or either of them; and the defendant excepted. The jury found a verdict for the plaintiff for $8,731.88, upon which judgment was entered. On appeal, the judgment was affirmed by the Supreme Court of the State (53 Mich. 593); and the case is brought here on writ of error.

Mr. M. J. Smiley, for plaintiff in error:

The Statute of Michigan under which the Manistee River Improvement Company was organized, as expounded by the Supreme Court of Michigan, is unconstitutional and void, being opposed to the Fourteenth Amendment of the Constitution of the United States, prohibiting the States from depriving any person of their property without due process of law, and denying to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.

Mr. Justice Field delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff in error, the defendant below, misapprehends the purport of the provision that no State shall deprive one of property without due process of law, when he considers the exaction of tolls under a statute for the use of an improved waterway as a deprivation of property within its meaning. There is no taking of property from him by such exaction within the prohibition, any more than there is a taking of property from a traveler, in requiring him to pay for his lodgings in a public inn. There is in such a transaction only an exchange of money for its supposed equivalent. The tolls exacted from the defendant are merely compensation for benefits conferred, by which the floating of his logs down the stream was facilitated.

There is no analogy between the imposition of taxes and the levying of tolls for improvement of highways; and any attempt to justify or condemn proceedings in the one case, by reference to those in the other, must be misleading. Taxes are levied for the support of government, and their amount is regulated by its necessities. Tolls are the compensation for the use of another's property, or of improvements made by him; and their amount is determined by the cost of the property, or of the improvements, and considerations of the return which such values or expenditures should yield. The Legislature, acting upon information received, may prescribe, at once, the tolls to be charged; but, ordinarily, it leaves their amount to be fixed by officers or boards appointed for that purpose, who may previously inspect the works, and ascertain the probable amount of business which will be transacted by means of them, and thus be more likely to adjust wisely the rates of toll in conformity with that business. This subject, like a multitude of other matters, can be better regulated by them than by the Legislature. In the administration of government, matters of detail are usually placed under the direction of officials. The execution of general directions of the law is left, in a great degree, to their judgment and fidelity. Any other course would be attended with infinite embarrassment.

In authorizing the Board of Control to fix rates of toll for the floating of logs and timber over the improved portions of the Manistee River certain limits are prescribed to its action; but within those limits the matter is left to its judgment. No notice can be given to parties, who may have occasion to use the stream, to attend before the board and present their views upon the tolls to be charged. Such parties cannot be known in advance. The occasion for using the improved stream may arise at any time in the year; perhaps after the tolls have been established. The whole subject is one of administrative regulation, in which a certain amount of discretionary authority is necessarily confided to officers entrusted with its execution. Should there be any gross injustice in the rate of tolls fixed, it would not, in our system of government, remain long uncorrected.

The Manistee River is wholly within the limits of Michigan. The State, therefore, can authorize any improvement which in its judgment will enhance its value as a means of transportation from one part of the State to another. The internal commerce of a State—that is, the commerce which is wholly confined within its limits—is as much under its control as foreign or interstate commerce is under the control of the General Government; and, to encourage the growth of this commerce and render it safe, the States may provide for the removal of obstructions from their rivers and harbors, and deepen their channels, and improve them in other ways, if, as is said in Mobile County v. Kimball, the free navigation of those waters, as permitted under the laws of the United States, is not impaired, or any system for the improvement of their navigation provided by the General Government is not defeated. 102 U. S. 691, 699 [26:238]. And to meet the cost of such improvements, the States may levy a general tax or lay a toll upon all who use the rivers and harbors as improved. The improvements are, in that respect, like wharves and docks constructed to facilitate commerce in loading and unloading vessels. Huse v. Glover, 119 U. S. 543, 548 [30:487]. Regulations of tolls or charges in such cases are mere matters of administration, under the entire control of the State.

There was no contract in the fourth article of the Ordinance of 1787 respecting the freedom of the navigable waters of the territory northwest of the Ohio River emptying into the St. Lawrence, which bound the people of the territory, or of any portion of it, when subsequently formed into a State and admitted into the Union.

The Ordinance of 1787 was passed a year and some months before the Constitution of the United States went into operation. Its framers, and the Congress of the confederation which passed it, evidently considered that the principles and declaration of rights and privileges expressed in its articles would always be of binding obligation upon the people of the territory. The ordinance in terms ordains and declares that its articles "shall be considered as articles of compact between the original States and the people and States in the said territory, and forever remain unalterable unless by common consent." And for many years after the adoption of the Constitution, its provisions were treated by various Acts of Congress as in force, except as modified by such Acts. In some of the Acts organizing portions of the territory under separate territorial governments it is declared that the rights and privileges granted by the ordinance are secured to the inhabitants of those Territories. Yet, from the very conditions on which the States formed out of that territory were admitted into the Union, the provisions of the ordinance became inoperative except as adopted by them. All the States thus formed were, in the language of the resolutions or Acts of Congress, "admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States, in all respects whatever." Michigan, on her admission, became, therefore, entitled to and possessed of all the rights of sovereignty and dominion which belonged to the original States, and could at any time afterwards exercise full control over its navigable waters except as restrained by the Constitution of the United States and laws of Congress passed in pursuance thereof. Permoli v. First Municipality of N. O. 44 U. S. 3 How. 589, 600 [28: 739]; Pollard v. Hagan, 44 U. S. 3 How. 212 [28: 565]; Escanaba Co. v. Chicago, 107 U. S. 678, 688, [27: 447]; Van Brocklin v. Tennessee, 117 U. S. 151, 159 [29: 845]; Huse v. Glover, 119 U. S. 544, 546 [30: 488].

But, independently of these considerations, there is nothing in the language of the fourth article of the ordinance respecting the navigable waters of the territory emptying into the St. Lawrence which, if binding upon the State, would prevent it from authorizing the improvements made in the navigation of the Manistee River. As we said in Huse v. Glover, decided at the last term: "The provision of the clause, that the navigable streams shall be highways without any tax, impost, or duty, has reference to their navigation in their natural state. It did not contemplate that such navigation might not be improved by artificial means, by the removal of obstructions, or by the making of dams for deepening the waters, or by turning into the rivers waters from other streams to increase their depth. For outlays caused by such works the State may exact reasonable tolls." 119 U. S. 548 [30: 488]. And again: "By the terms tax, impost, and duty, mentioned in the ordinance, is meant a charge for the use of the government, not compensation for improvements." Id. 549 [30: 490].

We perceive no error in the record, and the judgment of the Supreme Court of Michigan must be affirmed; and it is so ordered.

MANISTEE RIVER IMPROVEMENT CO.

IN ERROR to the Supreme Court of the State of Michigan.

The same questions are presented as in Sands v. Manistee River Improvement Co.; and, in conformity with the decision there rendered, the judgment herein is affirmed.

Plffs. in Err.,
v.
STATE OF NEBRASKA.

Appeal from order remanding suit to state court.

Since the Act of March 3, 1887, chap. 273, 24 Stat. at L. 552, no appeal or writ of error lies to this court under the Act of March 3, 1875, from an order of the circuit court remanding a suit which has been removed from a state court, whether the suit was begun and the removal had before or after the Act of 1887.

Submitted Nov. 1, 1887. Decided Nov. 14, 1887.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Nebraska.

On motion to dismiss. Granted.

Mr. J. M. Woolworth, for defendant in error:

Until the passage of the Act of March 3, 1887, this court had jurisdiction of a writ of error to a circuit court which remanded a cause to the state court from which it had been removed. The last clause of section five of the Act of March 3, 1875, 18 Stat. at L., 472, gave this jurisdiction. The provision is as follows:

"But the order of said circuit court, dismissing or remanding said cause to a state court, shall be reviewable by the supreme court on writ of error or appeal, as the case may be."

But this provision was repealed by the last clause of section two of the Act of 1887. That provision is as follows:

"Whenever any cause shall be removed from any state court into any Circuit Court of the United States, and the circuit court shall decide that the cause was improperly removed and order the same to be remanded to the state court from whence it came, such remand shall immediately be carried into execution, and no appeal or writ of error from the decision of the circuit court so remanding such cause shall be allowed."

This clause devests this court of the jurisdiction conferred upon it by the Act of 1875.

All cases fall with the repeal of a statute conferring jurisdiction over them.

Section 6, in terms, repeals the provision of the Act of 1875, which had conferred that jurisdiction. But to the repealing clause is added a proviso that the Act of 1887 "shall not affect jurisdiction over or disposition of any suit removed" before its passage. This proviso, however, is subject to an exception; it does not operate upon other express provisions of the Act. As the last clause of section 2 is express, its operation is not qualified by the terms of the proviso, and the repeal is effective as regards this case as well as any removed after the passage of the repealing statute.

This proviso does not apply to cases like this, where all that had been done in the state court was the filing the petition and bond for removal.

Messrs. A. J. Poppleton and J. M. Thurston, for plaintiffs in error:

It could not have been the intention of Congress to deny the writ of error in any case of removal under the Act of 1887, in which the cause is remanded by the circuit court, but the clause relied upon as accomplishing that purpose has sole reference to removals for prejudice and local influence. If this view of the statute is correct, section 6 saves and preserves the right to remove in any suit removed from the court of any State before the passage of the Act of March 3, 1887.

On the filing of a proper petition and bond in a suit which is removable, a state court is devested of jurisdiction and the cause is removed.

This is a writ of error for the review of an order of the circuit court remanding a suit which had been removed from the Supreme Court of the State of Nebraska. The suit was for a mandamus to compel Wilkinson, the Treasurer of Dakota County, to apply certain moneys in his hands, collected for that purpose, to the payment of past due coupons detached from bonds issued by the county. It was begun February 14, 1887. The defendants answered March 1, 1887, denying the validity of the bonds, and at the same time they presented their petition for the removal of the suit to the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Nebraska, on the ground that the relator was a citizen of Ohio and they were citizens of Nebraska. The state court directed the removal April 6, 1887, and a copy of the record was entered in the circuit court on the 19th of the same month. On the 27th of May the relator moved to remand the suit "on the ground that the circuit court was without jurisdiction to review the said cause, and to hear and determine the same." This motion was granted the same day, and thereupon the present writ of error was sued out by the defendants, which the relator now moves to dismiss for want of jurisdiction.

We have already decided at the present term, in Morey v. Lockhart, 123 U. S. 56 [ante, 68], that since the Act of March 3, 1887, chap. 373, 24 Stat. at L. 552, no appeal or writ of error lies to this court under the last paragraph of section 5 of the Act of March 3, 1875, from an order of the circuit court remanding a suit which had been removed from a state court. That, however was a case in which the suit was begun and the removal had after the Act of 1887 went into effect. Here the suit was begun and a petition for removal filed in the state court before the Act, and this it is contended saves to these parties their right to a writ of error under the Act of 1875, because of a proviso in section 6 of that of 1887, in these words: "Provided that this Act shall not affect the jurisdiction over or disposition of any suit removed from the court of any State, or suit commenced in any court of the United States, before the passage hereof, except as otherwise expressly provided in this Act."

This, in our opinion, relates only to the jurisdiction of the circuit court and the disposition of the suit on its merits; and has no reference to the jurisdiction of this court under the Act of 1875 for the review by appeal or writ of error of an order of the circuit court remanding the cause. That was "expressly provided" for in the last paragraph of section 2 of the Act of 1887, in which it was enacted that "Whenever any cause shall be removed from any state court into any Circuit Court of the United States, and the circuit court shall decide that the cause was improperly removed, and order the same to be remanded to the state court from whence it came, such remand shall be immediately carried into execution, and no appeal or writ of error from the decision of the circuit court so remanding such cause shall be allowed." This provision, when taken in connection with the repeal by section 6 of the last paragraph of section 5 of the Act of 1875, shows unmistakably an intention on the part of Congress to take away all appeals and writs of error to this court from orders thereafter made by circuit courts remanding suits which had been removed from a state court, and this, whether the suit was begun and the removal had before or after the Act of 1887.

The motion to dismiss is granted.

WILLIAM SELLERS ET AL.

1. Where an American patent is for the same invention as that for which an English patent had been issued, the term of the American patent is limited to run from the date, or sealing, which is equivalent to the publication, of the English patent; and not from its own date.

2. A patent cannot be exempted from the operation of the law on that subject by adding some new improvements to the invention.

3. The condition imposed by the Act of 1839, that the term of a patent for an invention which has been patented in a foreign country shall commence to run from the time of publication of the foreign patent, was not repealed or abrogated by the Act of 1861.

Mr. Justice Bradley delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a suit on a patent granted to the appellants, Charles W. and Frederick Siemens, of Great Britain, on the 12th day of January, 1869, being a reissue of a patent originally granted to the appellants on the 1st day of March, 1864. This patent was for an improved regenerator furnace, so called, intended to be used where a high degree of heat is required. By the arrangements of this invention, the products of combustion, after passing through the furnace, and before entering the chimney, are utilized in heating what are called the regenerators, consisting of bricks, or other refractory materials, loosely piled up in two pair of separate chambers through which, alternately, after being thus heated, the air and gases are made to pass on their way to the furnace, and thus become raised to an intense degree of heat before entering it. Whilst one pair of regenerators are being thus heated by the outgoing products of combustion or flame, the other pair are giving out their heat to the air and gases which are passing into the furnace; and then, by a reversal of dampers, the current is changed, and the air and gases are made to pass through the newly heated regenerators, and the products of combustion, or flame, through those that have become partially cooled; and so on alternately.

The apparatus has various incidental appliances necessary to its successful operation. Thus, as the regenerator chambers are placed underneath the furnace, spaces are formed between them and the furnace bottom, for the purpose of admitting a circulation of air to cool the parts and prevent their being destroyed by the intense heat. Another arrangement is that of a separate and distinct furnace of peculiar form, for the consumption of the raw fuel, so constructed and operated that the gases produced thereby are carried over by a suitable flue to one of the heated regenerators, whilst atmospheric air is admitted into the other regenerator of the same pair. The air and gases are thus kept separate until about to enter the furnace by separate flues, when they meet and commingle and produce a rapid combustion and a most intense heat.

This is the general nature of the invention, and this explanation will be sufficient for understanding the claims of the patent, which are four in number, and are as follows, to wit:

"We claim, in combination with a furnace, A, and its chimney or smoke discharge flue P, a system or series of air and gas regenerators B^1 B^2 B^3 B^4, constructed substantially as specified, and having conduits and dampers arranged so that air and gas may be led into and through such regenerators and furnace and out of the chimney, in manner and so as to be operated as and for the purpose or purposes hereinbefore described.

"We also claim the arrangement and combination of the air space or open chamber C with the furnace and its system of regenerators, arranged and applied together substantially in manner and so as to operate as described. [The air space here referred to is that by which the hearth of the furnace and other parts are cooled and prevented from destruction by the intense heat.]

"We also claim the arrangement and combination of the air chamber or space D, or the same and the space E, with the furnace, regenerators, conduits, and damper chests applied thereto, the whole being substantially as specified. [The air chamber D admits the atmospheric air to the regenerator.]

"We also claim the combination of a furnace with one or more regenerators or means of receiving its waste smoke and gaseous products, and intercepting or receiving heat therefrom, and also with means or devices by which all or a portion of the heat so intercepted or received may be absorbed by the influent air or gas during its passage into or to such furnace, for the purpose of improving or promoting combustion therein."

The defendants do not deny that the appellants were the authors of the very ingenious invention claimed by the patent; and they do not seriously deny that they use it. The principal defense which they set up is that the appellants took out an English patent for the same invention, dated January 22, 1861, and sealed July 19, 1861; and that, by force of the Acts of 1839 and 1861, the American patent expired at the end of seventeen years from the sealing of the English patent, namely, on the 19th day of July, 1878; and they deny that they used the said invention before the last mentioned date, and no evidence is given that they did do so.

The questions to be decided, therefore, are whether the English patent (which was given in evidence) was for the same invention as the American patent; and, if so, whether the latter is limited to expire at the end of seventeen years from the sealing of the former. We think that both of these questions must be answered in the affirmative.

As to the first question, we have carefully compared the two patents, the English and American, and can see no essential difference between them. They describe the same furnace in all essential particulars. The English specification is more detailed, and the drawings are more minute and full; but the same thing is described in both. There is only one claim in the English patent, it is true. But that claim, under the English patent system, entitled the patentees to their entire invention, and is at least as broad and comprehensive as all four claims in the American patent. It is in these terms:

"Having now described the nature of our invention and the best modes we are acquainted with of performing the same, we wish it to be understood that we do not confine ourselves to the precise details shown on the accompanying drawings; but we claim as our invention the various arrangements of regenerative furnaces worked by the gases resulting from an imperfect combustion of solid fuel in separate places, as hereinbefore set forth."

It is contended by the counsel of the complainants, that the American patent contains improvements which are not exhibited in the English patent. But if this were so, it would not help the complainants. The principal invention is in both; and if the American patent contains additional improvements, this fact cannot save the patent from the operation of the law which is invoked, if it is subject to that law at all. A patent cannot be exempted from the operation of the law by adding some new improvements to the invention; and cannot be construed as running partly from one date and partly from another. This would be productive of endless confusion.

We have, then, to examine the question whether the term of the American patent was limited to run from its own date, or from the date (or sealing—which is equivalent to the publication) of the English patent. The reissued patent sued on is dated January 12, 1869, but the original patent, which is the one to be looked at, was dated March 1, 1864. It was issued, therefore, before the Act of 1870, by which the patent laws were revised, and whilst the Acts of 1836, 1839 and 1861 were in force. The Act of 1836, as well as previous Acts, made the term of a patent fourteen years; but it authorized an extension of the term for seven years longer, if it should appear that the patentee, without neglect or fault on his part, failed to obtain a reasonable remuneration for his invention. By the same Act (section 7), if an invention for which a patent was sought, had been patented in a foreign country, before the application for a patent here, it was a bar to obtaining a patent in this country, unless (section 8) such foreign letters patent had been taken out by the applicant himself within six months previous to the filing of his specification and drawings. The Act of 1839 (section 6) removed the limitation of six months, and allowed a patent to be taken out here at any time after the inventor had taken out a patent for the same invention in a foreign country, provided it should not have been introduced into public and common use in the United States prior to the application for a patent here; "And provided also, that in all cases every such patent shall be limited to the term of fourteen years from the date or publication of such foreign letters patent."

The Act of 1861 introduced several changes in the administration of the Patent Office, and gave a right to patents for designs. The last section (section 16) declared as follows: to wit, "that all patents hereafter granted shall remain in force for the term of seventeen years from the date of issue; and all extension of such patents is hereby prohibited."

The Act of 1870, which was a revision of all previous laws relating to patents, continued the period of seventeen years as the term of a patent, and in case a foreign patent had been previously issued, declared that the American patent should expire at the same time with the foreign patent, or, if more than one, at the same time with the one having the shortest term; but, in no case, for a longer term than seventeen years. This provision is substantially carried forward into the Revised Statutes. Sec. 4887.

The appellants contend that the Act of 1861 repealed that portion of the Act of 1839 which declared that a patent should be limited to the term of fourteen years from the date or publication of prior foreign letters patent for the same invention. So far as the period of fourteen years is concerned, this is, undoubtedly, true. Prior to 1861 all patents, as we have seen, were granted for the term of fourteen years, with a right, under certain circumstances, to an extension for seven years longer. This right of extension was attended with many inconveniences and much expense to meritorious patentees, and Congress, by the Act of 1861, cut it off, and made the term of all patents seventeen years—a compromise between fourteen and twenty-one years. The Act had nothing to do with the question of foreign patents, but only with the term for which patents should ordinarily run; and the period of seventeen years, without any privilege of extension, was adopted in lieu of fourteen years with a provisional right of extension. That was the sole point before the legislative mind. Seventeen years limit was substituted for fourteen years. That was all that was intended or thought of. We are of opinion, therefore, that the condition imposed by the Act of 1839, that the term of a patent for an invention which has been patented in a foreign country shall commence to run from the time of publication of the foreign patent, was not repealed or abrogated by the Act of 1861. If it was, it follows that there was a period of nine years, from 1861 to 1870, in which our patent system presented the anomaly of allowing patents to be taken out in this country at any length of time after the invention had been patented abroad, and without being subject to any condition, limitation, or restriction. This can hardly be supposed to have been the intention of Congress.

No doubt, the words of a law are generally to have a controlling effect upon its construction; but the interpretation of those words is often to be sought from the surrounding circumstances and preceding history. From the history of the law in this case, as exhibited in previous enactments, and from the evident object and purpose of section 16 of the Act of 1861, we are satisfied that the words there used to define and limit the term during which patents thereafter granted should remain in force, namely, "seventeen years from the date of issue," were only intended to change the length of the term, and not the point of its commencement. The latter continued as before, at "the date of issue," as defined by previous laws—referring either to the issue of the American patent itself, when no foreign patent had been previously obtained, or to that of the latter when such a patent had been obtained. This view of the construction and meaning of the Act of 1861 was fully explained and enforced by Mr. Justice Blatchford in the case of De Florez v. Raynolds, 17 Blatchf. 436; S. C. 8 Fed. Rep. 484.

JOHN STORY JENKS ET AL., Exrs. of WILLIAM P. JENKS.

Deed of married woman to secure husband's debt —wife's acknowledgment, when cannot be contradicted—receiver.

1. By a deed voluntarily executed and duly acknowledged by a husband and his wife, the entire title of both to land in the District of Columbia may be conveyed, to secure the payment of his debt, notwithstanding that the Act of Congress of 1869 exempted her property from liability for his debts.
2. Under the Revised Statutes of the District of Columbia, where a deed has been executed by a married woman of full age and sound mind, a certificate of her separate examination and acknowledgement, in the form prescribed by the statute, and duly recorded with the deed, cannot afterwards, except for fraud or duress, be controlled or avoided by extrinsic evidence of the manner in which the examination was conducted by the magistrate.
3. Rents received by a receiver of a bank, under a decree of the court, are properly distributable among the creditors of the bank.

Mr. Justice Gray delivered the opinion of the court:

The original suit was a bill in equity, filed January 10, 1879, by Keyser, as the receiver of the German American National Bank, against Hitz and wife, Donaldson, Prentiss, Chipley, Halstead, Crane, Tyler and Jenks, to enforce a deed, in the nature of a mortgage, dated January 26, 1876, by which Hitz and wife conveyed land in Washington to Donaldson and Prentiss, in trust to secure the payment of promissory notes for $20,000, made by Chipley, indorsed by Halstead and held by the bank; as well as to set aside, as made in fraud of the bank, the following conveyances of the same land: 1. A release, dated June 16, 1877, from Donaldson and Prentiss to Mrs. Hitz. 2. A deed, of the same date, from Hitz and wife to Crane. 3. A deed, dated June 18, 1877, from Crane to Tyler, in trust to secure the payment of Crane's promissory notes for $20,000, payable to Hitz and by him indorsed to Jenks.

Mrs. Hitz filed a cross bill against Keyser and her codefendants, alleging that she was induced to execute the conveyance to Crane by fraud and in ignorance of its contents; and praying for a cancellation both of that conveyance and of the deed of trust from Crane to Tyler, and for an account of rents and profits. By leave of court, she afterwards amended her bill so as to allege that the deed to Crane was fraudulently altered after she executed it.

After a hearing upon pleadings and proofs, it was adjudged at the special term, by a decree made November 28, 1881, and amended December 15, 1881, that these two deeds were valid against Hitz, but void as against his wife; that the former deed of trust had been discharged by payment and release; and that Keyser account for the rents and profits previously received by him, and collect and pay into court all rents subsequently accruing. From that decree Mrs. Hitz, Jenks and Keyser each appealed to the General Term, which on December 11, 1883, reversed the decree of the special term, and dismissed both bills, save that the cause was retained to take an account of the rents and profits received or which should have been received by Keyser, and to determine the right to those rents and profits, which were claimed by Mrs. Hitz as her separate property, by Jenks as part of the security afforded by the deed of trust to Tyler, and by Keyser under judgments recovered against Hitz. 2 Mackey, 513. On July 13, 1885, a further decree was entered in General Term, denying the right of Mrs. Hitz to any part of those rents and profits. 4 Mackey, 179. From each decree of the General Term she alone appealed to this court.

The principal matter to be determined is the validity, as against Mrs. Hitz, of the conveyance from her husband and herself to Crane, and of the deed of trust from Crane to Tyler. The evidence establishes the following facts:

Mr. and Mrs. Hitz were married in 1856, children were born to them, and she inherited the land in question from her father, before the passage of the Act of Congress providing that "in the District of Columbia the right of any married woman to any property, personal or real, belonging to her at the time of marriage, or acquired during marriage in any other way than by gift or conveyance from her husband, shall be as absolute as if she were feme sole, and shall not be subject to the disposal of her husband, nor be liable for his debts; but such married woman may convey, devise and bequeath the same, or any interest therein, in the same manner and with like effect as if she were unmarried." Act April 10, 1869, chap. 28, § 1, 16 Stat. 45; R. S. D. C. §§ 727, 728.

Chipley and Halstead were men of no means, and the real object of the deed of trust from Hitz and wife to Donaldson and Prentiss was to secure certain liabilities of Hitz to the bank, of which he was then president. The object of making the deeds from Hitz and wife to Crane and from Crane to Tyler was to secure the payment of money actually advanced by Jenks to Hitz, and by Hitz applied to the payment of the notes secured by the former deed of trust.

The evidence satisfactorily proves that no fraud was practiced upon Mrs. Hitz, and that the deed from herself and her husband to Crane was put in its present form before it was signed by either of them. As these are pure matters of fact, and the evidence relating to them is well summed up in the opinion of the court below, they need not be enlarged upon. 2 Mackey, 521-526.

There can be no doubt that by a deed, voluntarily executed and duly acknowledged by the husband and the wife, the entire title of both might be conveyed to secure the payment of his debt, notwithstanding that the Act of 1869, as construed by this court, exempted the land or any interest therein, from being taken on execution against him. Hitz v. National Met. Bank, 111 U. S. 722 [28:577]; Mattoon v. McGrew, 112 U. S. 713 [28:824].

The more important question is, whether the appellant has shown by competent and sufficient proof that her acknowledgment of the deed to Crane did not fulfill the requirements of the Revised Statutes of the District of Columbia upon the subject, which are as follows:

By section 441, acknowledgments of deeds may be made before any judge of a court of record and of law, or any chancellor of a State, or a judge of a court of the United States, or a justice of the peace, or a notary public, or a commissioner of the circuit court of the district.

By section 450, "when any married woman shall be a party executing a deed for the conveyance of real estate or interest therein, and shall only be relinquishing her right of dower, or when she shall be a party with her husband to any deed, it shall be the duty of the officer authorized to take acknowledgments, before whom she may appear, to examine her privily and apart from her husband, and to explain to her the deed fully."

By section 451, "if, upon such privy examination and explanation, she shall acknowledge the deed to be her act and deed, and shall declare that she had willingly signed, sealed and delivered the same, and that she wished not to retract it, the officer shall certify such examination, acknowledgment and declaration by a certificate annexed to the deed, and under his hand and seal, to the following effect," that is to say, beginning in the usual form of a certificate of acknowledgment, and adding that "being by me examined privily and apart from her husband, and having the deed aforesaid fully explained to her, she acknowledged the same to be her act and deed, and declared that she had willingly signed, sealed and delivered the same, and that she wished not to retract it."

By section 452, "when the privy examination, acknowledgment and declaration of a married woman is taken and certified and delivered to the recorder of deeds for record, in accordance with the provisions of this chapter, the deed shall be as effectual in law as if she had been an unmarried woman," except as to any covenants therein.

These provisions substantially re-enact statutes which have been in force ever since 1715 in the District of Columbia, and in the State of Maryland out of which the District was formed. Maryland Stat. 1715, chap. 47, § 11; 1752, chap. 8; 1766, chap. 14, § 6; 1797, chap. 103, § 3—all in Kilty's Laws; Dist. Col. Laws, 1868, pp. 21, 28, 86; Acts May 31, 1832, chap. 112, 4 Stat. 520; April 20, 1838, chap. 57, § 4, 5 Stat. 227.

The conveyance of the estates of married women by deed, with separate examination and acknowledgment, has taken the place of the alienation of such estates by fine in a court of record under the law of England, though differing in some of its effects, owing to the diversity in the nature of the two modes of proceeding.

A fine was in the form of a judgment of a court of record, at first in an actual, and afterwards in a fictitious suit by the conusee against the conusors to recover possession of the land; and derived its very name from its putting an end to that suit and to all other controversies concerning the same matter. 2 Bl. Com. 349; Co. Litt. 262 a. A party could not therefore impeach it at law, even for infancy (except by writ of error sued out while still under age) or for insanity. Bac. Abr. Fines and Recoveries, Fines C; 5 Cruise, Dig. tit. 35, chap. 5, §§ 41–54; Murley v. Sherren, 1 Perry & D. 126; S. C. 8 Ad. & El. 754. Yet if any fraud or undue practice was used in obtaining the fine, the court of chancery would relieve against it, as against any other conveyance. 5 Cruise, Dig. tit. 35, chap. 14, §§ 68–77; Bulkley v. Wilford, 2 Clark & F. 102; Conry v. Caulfield, 2 Ball & B. 255.

On the other hand, the alienation of land by deed of husband and wife with her separate examination and acknowledgment is, in form as well as in fact, a conveyance by the parties, and therefore does not, even if the acknowledgment is certified by a magistrate in the form prescribed by statute, and recorded, bind a wife who, by reason of infancy or insanity, is incapable of conveying. Sims v. Everhardt, 102 U. S. 300 [26: 87]; Williams v. Baker, 71 Pa. 476; Priest v. Cummings, 16 Wend. 617, 681, and 20 Wend. 338, 349; Jackson v. Schoonmaker, 4 Johns. 161. In any case of fraud or duress, also, it may be impeached by bill in equity, or, in some States, in an action at law. Central Bank v. Copeland, 18 Md. 305; Schrader v. Decker, 9 Pa. 14; Louden v. Blythe, 16 Pa. 532, and 27 Pa. 22; Hall v. Patterson, 51 Pa. 289; Jackson v. Hayner, 12 Johns. 469; Fisher v. Meister, 24 Mich. 447; Wiley v. Prince, 21 Tex. 637.

The statute of 18 Edw. I. De Modo Levandi Fines enacted that if a feme covert should be one of the parties to a fine, then she must first be examined by certain justices, and if she did not assent to the fine it should not be levied. Yet this was always understood to mean that the fine ought not to be received without her examination and free consent; but that if it was received and recorded, neither she nor her heirs could be permitted to aver that she was not examined and did not consent, "for this," says Lord Coke, "should be against the record of the court, and tending to the weakening of the general assurances of the realm." 2 Inst. 510, 515; Bac. Abr. ubi supra.

The object of a statute, like that now before us, requiring the separate examination of the wife to be taken by a judicial officer or notary public, to be certified by him in a particular form, and to be recorded in the registry of deeds, is twofold; not only to protect the wife by making it the duty of such an officer to ascertain and to certify that she has not executed the deed by compulsion of her husband or in ignorance of its contents; but also to facilitate the conveyance of the estates of married women, and to secure and perpetuate evidence, upon which innocent grantees as well as subsequent purchasers may rely, that the requirements of the statute, necessary to give validity to the deed, have been complied with. Lawrence v. Heister, 3 Harr. & J. 371.

The duty of examining the wife privily and apart from her husband, of explaining the deed to her fully, and of ascertaining that she executed it of her own free will, without coercion or under influence of his, is a duty imposed by law upon the officer, involving the exercise of judgment and discretion, and thus a judicial or quasi-judicial act. The magistrate is required to ascertain a particular state of facts, and, having ascertained it, to certify it for record, for the benefit of the parties to the deed, and of all others who may thereafter acquire rights under it. And the statute expressly provides that upon the recording of the certificate "the deed shall be as effectual in law as if she had been an unmarried woman."

The reasonable, if not the necessary conclusion is, that, except in case of fraud, the certificate, made and recorded as the statute requires, is the sole and conclusive evidence of the separate examination and acknowledgment of the wife.

It has been decided by this court, in a case arising, under a similar statute of Virginia, that if the certificate, as recorded, is silent as to these facts, the want cannot be supplied by parol evidence that the wife was duly examined; and this for the reason stated by Mr. Justice Trimble, in delivering judgment, as follows: "What the law requires to be done, and appear of record, can only be done and made to appear by the record itself, or an exemplification of the record. It is perfectly immaterial whether there be an acknowledgment or privy examination in fact or not, if there be no record made of the privy examination; for, by the express provisions of the law, it is not the fact of privy examination merely, but the recording of the fact which makes the deed effectual to pass the estate of a feme covert." Elliott v. Peirsol, 26 U. S. 1 Pet. 328, 340 [7:164, 170].

That the magistrate's certificate, when made in the form required by the statute, and duly recorded, is conclusive evidence that he has performed his duty, has not been directly adjudged by this court; but the course of its decisions has tended to this conclusion. In Drury v. Foster, Mr. Justice Nelson, in delivering judgment, observed: "There is authority for saying, that where a perfect deed has been signed and acknowledged before the proper officer, an inquiry into the examination of the feme covert, embracing the requisites of the statute, as constituting the acknowledgment, with a view to contradict the writing, is inadmissible; that the acts of the officer for this purpose are judicial and conclusive." 69 U. S. 2 Wall. 24, 34, [17:780, 781]. And in Young v. Duvall, the court said that if the officer's certificate "can be contradicted, to the injury of those who in good faith have acted upon it, the proof to that end must be such as will clearly and fully show the certificate to be false or fraudulent. The mischiefs that would ensue from a different rule could not well be overstated. The cases of hardship upon married women that might occur under the operation of such a rule are of less consequence than the general insecurity of titles to real estate, which would inevitably follow from one less rigorous." 109 U. S. 573, 577 [27:1086, 1088].

It would be inconsistent with the reasons above stated, as well as with a great weight of authority, to hold that, in the case of a deed actually executed by a married woman of full age and sound mind, a certificate of her separate examination and acknowledgment, in the form prescribed by the statute, and duly recorded with the deed, can afterwards, except for fraud, be controlled or avoided by extrinsic evidence of the manner in which the examination was conducted by the magistrate. Comegys v. Clarke, 44 Md. 108; Jamison v. Jamison, 8 Whart. 457; Williams v. Baker, 71 Pa. 476; Harkins v. Forsyth, 11 Leigh, 294; Greene v. Godfrey, 44 Me. 25; Baldwin v. Snowden, 11 Ohio St. 203; Graham v. Anderson, 42 Ill. 514; Dolph v. Barney, 5 Oreg. 191; Johnston v. Wallace, 58 Miss. 331; Hartley v. Frosh, 6 Tex. 208. See also Bancks v. Ollerton, 10 Exch. 168, 182.

As to such of the cases, cited by the learned counsel for the appellant, as have not been already referred to, it may be remarked that in Rhea v. Rhenner, 26 U. S. 1 Pet. 105 [7:72], in Hepburn v. Dubois, 37 U. S. 12 Pet. 345 [9:1111] in Dewey v. Campau, 4 Mich. 565, and in O'Ferrall v. Simplot, 4 Iowa, 381, the requisite certificate was either wanting or defective upon its face; and that Dodge v. Hollinshead, 6 Minn. 25, and Landers v. Bolton, 26 Cal. 393, were decided under statutes which expressly provided that the certificate should not be conclusive, but might be rebutted by other evidence.

In the case at bar, the recorded certificate of the notary public who took the acknowledgment is in the form given in the statute. The other evidence on the subject is the testimony of the appellant and of the notary. The appellant, being called as a witness in her own behalf, admitted her signature, but did not recollect that she ever executed or acknowledged the deed in question, and denied that it was ever explained to her. The notary, being called as a witness by the appellees, testified that in taking her acknowledgment he asked her if she had read over the deed and understood its contents, and if she willingly signed, sealed and delivered it, without any compulsion on the part of her husband, and wished not to retract it, to all which she answered in the affirmative; that he did not otherwise explain the deed to her, and did not read it himself; and that he did not think it necessary to explain a deed if the party was already acquainted with its contents.

The appellant's signature being admitted, and there being no proof of fraud or duress in taking or procuring her acknowledgment, the extrinsic evidence was, for the reasons and upon the authorities before stated, incompetent to impeach the notary's certificate as to the manner in which he had performed his duty.

The result is that the appellant shows no ground for reversing the principal decree, and it only remains to consider her claim to rents and profits. This claim consists of two parts:

First. For rents received, with the consent of Hitz, by Keyser as receiver, appointed by the Comptroller of the Currency, of the national bank, from the time of his appointment as such receiver in October, 1878, to the date of the decree of the court below in special term, December 15, 1881. But it appears that the moneys so received were paid by him into the Treasury of the United States, subject to the order of his superior officer, the Comptroller of the Currency, as required by section 5234 of the Revised Statutes, and were distributed by the Comptroller among the creditors of the bank. They were therefore rightly treated by the court below as not to be accounted for in this cause.

Second. For rents received by Keyser under his appointment as receiver by the decree of the court in special term on December 15, 1881, and paid by him into the registry of the court, pursuant to that decree, from its date until its reversal in General Term on December 11, 1883. It is argued for the appellant that by the rule affirmed in Teal v. Walker, 111 U. S. 242 [28: 415], a mortgagee is not entitled to rents and profits until he has been lawfully put in possession of the land; and that Keyser, having been admitted into possession by Hitz only, cannot hold the rents and profits against Mrs. Hitz. The conclusive answer to this argument is that the accruing rents were not received and held by Keyser by virtue of an agreement with Hitz; but the court, through Keyser as its receiver, took possession of these rents in order to preserve them for the party who should ultimately prevail in the suit. When it was afterwards adjudged that the first deed of trust, and the debt thereby secured, which Keyser's original bill sought to enforce, had been released and discharged, and that the second deed of trust was valid as against Mrs. Hitz; and the sum obtained for the land at a sale under the power contained in this deed proved insufficient, by more than the whole of the fund in court, to pay the debt of Hitz to Jenks, secured by this deed, it was rightly held that Mrs. Hitz had no right as against Jenks to any part of this fund. This view disposes of the case, independently of the application of part of the fund to the payment of taxes accrued during the pendency of this suit; and even if the rents originally belonged to Mrs. Hitz, and not to her husband as tenant by the curtesy, which is by no means clear. Hitz v. National Met. Bank, 111 U. S. 722 [28:577].

GEORGE HOVEY.

Driven well patent, void—more than two years' prior use.

1. The driven well patent, No. 4372, granted to Nelson W. Green, May 9, 1871, is invalid because the invention was used in public more than two years before the application for the patent.

2. A patent granted under the Act of 1839 is void, if there had been more than two years' use of the invention prior to the application therefor, whether such use was, or was not, with the knowledge or consent of the applicant.

If the original patent was not inoperative or void, by reason of defective specifications, there was no law authorizing the reissue. Mr. Justice Blatchford delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a suit in equity brought by the appellants for the infringement of reissued letters patent No. 4372, granted to Nelson W. Green, one of the appellants, May 9, 1871, for an "improvement in the methods of constructing artesian wells," the original patent, No. 78425, having been granted to said Green, as inventor, January 14, 1868, on an application filed March 17, 1868.

This patent was before this court in the cases of Eames v. Andrews and Beedle v. Bennett, at October Term, 1886, reported in 122 U. S. 40 and 71 [30: 1064, 1074]. In those cases, this court sustained the validity of the reissued patent and affirmed the decrees of the circuit courts. In the present case, the decree of the circuit court was against the validity of the patent, and the bill was dismissed. 5 McCrary, 181. From that decree the plaintiffs have appealed.

The patent is familiarly known as the "driven well" patent. The specifications and drawings of the original and reissued patents are set forth in the opinion of this court in Eames v. Andrews. Numerous defenses are set up in the answer in the present case, and voluminous proofs have been taken in respect to those defenses; but it is necessary to consider only one of them, which, in our view, is fatal to the validity of the patent; and that is, that the invention was used in public, at Cortland, in the State of New York, by others than Green, more than two years before the application for the patent.

The brief of the appellants concedes that it is shown in this case that other persons than Green put the invention into public use more than two years before his application was filed. It is contended for the appellants that this was done without his knowledge, consent or allowance. The appellee contends that such knowledge, consent or allowance was not necessary in order to invalidate the patent, while the appellants contend that it was necessary. The whole question depends upon the proper construction of section 7 of the Act of March 3, 1839, 5 Stat. at L. 354, interpreted in connection with sections 6, 7, and 15 of the Act of July 4, 1836, 5 Stat. at L. 119, 123.

A list of the various cases decided in the circuit courts brought on the reissued "driven well" patent, is given in the case of Eames v. Andrews, at page 47 [1066]. In none of those cases, except the present one and those heard at the same time with it, did the question thus presented arise. In Andrews v. Carman, 13 Blatchf. 307, 324, the question involved and considered by the court was that of a dedication and abandonment to the public of his invention by Green prior to his application, founded upon acts done by him. The conclusion of the court was, that there was no evidence of any use or sale of the invention by Green prior to his application for a patent, nor any direct proof of knowledge on his part of any use or sale of the invention by others within two years prior to his application, nor sufficient evidence from which to properly infer that he had such knowledge. The question of the use of his invention by others more than two years prior to his application does not appear to have been raised.

Nor was it raised in Andrews v. Cross, 19 Blatchf. 294. One of the defenses set up in the answer in that case was "that the claim of Green as inventor was barred because the improvement was in use more than two years prior to the granting of his patent," and, as was said in the opinion in that case, there was "no allegation that the invention was in public use in the United States for more than two years before Green applied for his original patent, or that any use was with his consent or allowance, or that he abandoned the invention to the public in fact, or otherwise than inferentially from the fact alleged, that it was in use for more than two years before his original patent was granted." The conclusion of the circuit court in Andrews v. Cross was, that no abandonment or dedication of the invention to the public by Green was shown; and that there was no evidence of any use or sale of the invention by Green before his application, and no sufficient evidence from which to conclude that any use of any driven well by others before his application was consented to or allowed by him. The use by others thus referred to was, as in Andrews v. Carman, a use within two years prior to the application.

The point was not presented in Eames v. Andrews or in Beedle v. Bennett, and in the opinion in the latter case, it was said p. 77 [1076]: "There is no evidence in the record of any use or sale of the invention by Green before his application for a patent, and no evidence from which to conclude that any use of any driven well by others before his application was consented to or allowed by him, except in the instances mentioned at Cortland, which were merely experimental tests, made by himself. Much less is there any evidence to show that there was any use of the invention by others for more than two years prior to his application."

The question involved has never been decided by this court. In Egbert v. Lippmann, 104 U. S. 333, 334 [26: 755] it was said: "Since the passage of the Act of 1839, it has been strenuously contended that the public use of an invention for more than two years before such application, even without his" the inventor's "consent and allowance, renders the letters patent therefor void. It is unnecessary in this case to decide this question, for the alleged use of the invention covered by the letters patent to Barnes is conceded to have been with his express consent." In that case, the circuit court had, in Egbert v. Lippmann, 15 Blatchf. 295, held that the effect of the Act of 1839 was to require that the inventor should not permit his invention to be used in public at a period earlier than two years prior to his application for a patent, under the penalty of having his patent rendered void by such use; and that consent and allowance by the inventor were not necessary to such invalidity. The circuit court said that the policy introduced by the Act of 1839, and continued by sections 24 and 61 of the Act of July 8, 1870, 16 Stat. at L. 201, 208, now sections 4886 and 4920 of the Revised Statutes, was, "That the inventor must apply for his patent within two years after his invention is in such a condition that he can apply for a patent for it, and that, if he does not apply within such time, but applies after the expiration of such time and obtains a patent, and it appears that his invention was in public use at a time more than two years earlier than the date of his application, his patent will be void, even though such public use was without his knowledge, consent, or allowance, and even though he was in fact the original and first inventor of the thing patented and so in public use." The circuit court, in that case, appears to have decided the question on the view that the defense set up in the answer was that the invention had been known and in use in the United States more than two years before the application, and that there was no issue as to whether the public use for more than two years was with the consent or allowance of the patentee; but this court decided the case on the question of the consent of the patentee to the use for more than [two] years before the application.

The original patent in the present case, having been applied for and issued prior to the passage of the Act of 1870, is to be governed by the provisions of the Acts of 1836 and 1839. Section 6 of the Act of 1836 provided for the issuing of a patent to an inventor for an invention not known or used by others before his discovery or invention thereof, "and not, at the time of his application for a patent, in public use or on sale, with his consent or allowance, as the inventor or discoverer." Section 7 of the same Act provided for the issuing of a patent if, on examination, it should not appear to the commissioner that the invention had been made by any other person in this country prior to its being made by the applicant, or that it had been patented or described in any printed publication in this or any foreign country, "or had been in public use or on sale with the applicant's consent or allowance prior to the application." Section 15 of the same Act provided that the defendant, in an action for the infringement of a patent, might show, among other things, that the thing patented "had been in public use, or on sale, with the consent and allowance of the patentee, before his application for a patent;" and that, if that was shown, judgment should be rendered for the defendant.

The seventh section of the Act of 1839 was in these words: "That every person or corporation who has, or shall have, purchased or constructed any newly invented machine, manufacture, or composition of matter, prior to the application of the inventor or discoverer for a patent, shall be held to possess the right to use, and vend to others to be used, the specific machine, manufacture, or composition of matter so made or purchased, without liability therefor to the inventor, or any other person interested in said invention; and no patent shall be held to be invalid by reason of such purchase, sale, or use prior to the application for a patent as aforesaid, except on proof of abandonment of such invention to the public; or that such purchase, sale, or prior use has been for more than two years prior to such application for a patent."

The Act of July 8, 1870, repealed the Act of 1839, but provided (section 111) that such repeal should not affect, impair, or take away any right existing under the Act of 1839. Section 24 of the Act of 1870, now embodied in section 4886 of the Revised Statutes, was in these words: "That any person who has invented or discovered any new and useful art, machine, manufacture, or composition of matter, or any new and useful improvement thereof, not known or used by others in this country, and not patented, or described in any printed publication in this or any foreign country, before his invention or discovery thereof, and not in public use or on sale for more than two years prior to his application, unless the same is proved to have been abandoned, may, upon payment of the duty required by law, and other due proceedings had, obtain a patent therefor."

Section 37 of the Act of 1870, now embodied in section 4899 of the Revised Statutes, provided as follows: "That every person who may have purchased of the inventor, or with his knowledge and consent may have constructed any newly invented or discovered machine, or other patentable article, prior to the application by the inventor or discoverer for a patent, or sold or used one so constructed, shall have the right to use, and vend to others to be used, the specific thing so made or purchased, without liability therefor."

In section 61 of the Act of 1870 it was enacted, that, in any action for infringement, the defendant might prove on the trial, as a defense, among other things, that the thing patented "had been in public use or on sale in this country, for more than two years before his application for a patent, or had been abandoned to the public," and that, if such special matter alleged should be found for the defendant, judgment should be rendered for him. This provision is now found in section 4920 of the Revised Statutes.

It is very plain that, under the Act of 1836, if the thing patented had been in public use or on sale with the consent or allowance of the applicant for any time, however short, prior to his application, the patent issued to him was invalid. Then came section 7 of the Act of 1839, which was intended as an amelioration in favor of the inventor, in this respect, of the strict provisions of the Act of 1836. The first clause of that section provides for the protection of a person who, prior to the application for the patent, purchases or constructs a specific machine or article, and declares that he may use and sell such specific machine or article after the patent is issued, without liability to the patentee. The section does not require, in order to this protection, that the purchase or construction shall have been with the consent or allowance of the person who afterwards obtains the patent and seeks to enforce it against such purchaser or constructor. The words "consent or allowance" are not found in the provision. The only requirement is that the specific machine or article shall have been purchased or constructed at some time prior to the application for a patent. The second clause of the section then passes to consider the effect upon the validity of the patent "of such purchase, sale, or use prior to the application" for the patent, and declares that "no patent shall be held to be invalid by reason of such purchase, sale, or use prior to the application for a patent, as aforesaid, except on proof of abandonment of such invention to the public, or that such purchase, sale, or prior use has been for more than two years prior to such application for a patent." The expression "such purchase" clearly means the purchase from any person, and not merely from the person who becomes the patentee of the machine or article. The expression "such sale or use" clearly refers to the use or sale by the person who has purchased or constructed the machine or article, the right to use and sell which is given to him by the first part of the section. That right is given to a person who has constructed the machine or article, as well as to one who has purchased it; and the plain declaration of the second part of the section is, that, where the purchase or construction of the machine or article took place more than two years prior to the application for the patent, or where the use or sale by the person who so purchased or constructed the machine or article took place at a time more than two years prior to the application, the patent becomes invalid. It is not possible in any other way to give full effect to the word "constructed," in the first part of the section. The word "purchased" and the word "constructed" are used in the same connection, and in connection with the words "so made or purchased," which occur afterwards; and the word "purchased" cannot be limited to a purchase from the applicant for the patent, nor can the word "constructed" be limited to a construction with the consent and allowance of such applicant, without interpolating into the statute the words "consent or allowance." We can find no warrant for doing this. The evident purpose of the section was to fix a period of limitation which should be certain, and require only a calculation of time, and should not depend upon the uncertain question of whether the applicant had consented to or allowed the sale or use. Its object was to require the inventor to see to it that he filed his application within two years from the completion of his invention, so as to cut off all question of the defeat of his patent by a use or sale of it by others more than two years prior to his application, and thus leave open only the question of priority of invention. The evident intention of Congress was to take away the right (which existed under the Act of 1836) to obtain a patent after an invention had for a long period of time been in public use without the consent or allowance of the inventor; it limited that period to two years, whether the inventor had or had not consented to or allowed the public use. The right of an inventor to obtain a patent was in this respect narrowed, and the rights of the public as against him were enlarged, by the Act of 1839. The language of section 24 of the Act of 1870, now section 4886 of the Revised Statutes, is to the same effect, and carries out the policy inaugurated by the Act of 1839. It allows a patent to be granted only for an invention which was not in public use or on sale for more than two years prior to the application for the patent, subject to the defense of abandonment within such two years, which is also the requirement of section 61 of the same Act; while section 37 of that Act requires that a person, in order to have the right to use and sell, without liability, a specific thing made or purchased prior to the application for the patent, shall have purchased it of the inventor or constructed it with his knowledge and consent.

In view of the fact that section 37 of the Act of 1870 re-enacts the first part of section 7 of the Act of 1839, with the addition, ex industria, of the requirement, in order to confer the right to use the specific thing in question, that the purchase of it should have been from the inventor or the construction of it should have been with his knowledge and consent, and of the further fact that section 24 of the Act of 1870 re-enacts the second part of section 7 of the Act of 1839, and does not contain a requirement that the public use or sale for more than two years prior to the application shall have been with the consent or allowance of the patentee, in order to invalidate the patent, it may fairly be said, that it was the view of Congress that section 7 of the Act of 1839 did not require, as an element, the knowledge, consent or allowance of the applicant.

Views are to be found in decisions of circuit courts, not in harmony with the construction we have thus put upon section 7 of the Act of 1839. That construction was upheld in the very full opinion given by Judge Love, one of the judges who sat in the present case in the circuit court. 5 McCrary, 204. It was indicated as the proper construction in the opinion of this court in Elizabeth v. Nicholson Pavement Co. 97 U. S. 126, 134 [24:1000,1004], which was the case of a patent issued under the Act of 1839, and where this court, speaking by Mr. Justice Bradley, said, in regard to that Act: "An abandonment of an invention to the public may be evinced by the conduct of the inventor at any time, even within the two years named in the law. The effect of the law is that no such consequence will necessarily follow from the invention being in public use or on sale, with the inventor's consent and allowance, at any time within two years before his application; but that, if the invention is in public use or on sale prior to that time, it will be conclusive evidence of abandonment, and the patent will be void."

EDWIN A. MERRITT, Late Collector of the PORT OF NEW YORK.

Merchant appraiser—qualifications of—examination by—witness.

1. An importer is entitled, under section 2930, R. S., to have a merchant appraiser who is familiar with the character and value of the goods in question, and is entitled to raise the question of want of qualification of the appraiser, in a suit at law, brought to recover an excess of duties; such qualification being one of the conditions on which the validity of the assessment depends.

2. The importer may also show, in such action, that the appraiser did not observe the requirements of section 2901 of the Revised Statutes by opening, examining and appraising the packages designated by the collector; the appraisement being vitiated by proof of a failure of the appraiser so to do.

3. The merchant appraiser is a competent witness, in such action, to prove that he was not familiar with the character and value of the goods, and the extent and character of the examination which he made of them.

Argued Nov. 3, 1887. Decided Nov. 21, 1887.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York. Reversed.

The facts of the case are fully stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Daniel H. Chamberlain, W. B. Hornblower and Eugene H. Lewis, for plaintiffs in error:

Was Mr. Bates such a person as is contemplated by the statute? Were the reappraisement proceedings fatally irregular by reason of the appointment of a merchant appraiser not qualified, in the manner prescribed by law, to act? These questions should have been submitted to the jury to pass upon them.

Another material issue of fact was tendered by the protest and pleadings and was sought to be supported by evidence which was excluded, viz., the question whether the merchant appraiser sufficiently examined the merchandise under appraisement to comply with the positive requirements of law. There can be no doubt, under the authorities, of the materiality of this issue.

The merchant appraiser was a competent witness to prove his own disqualification for the office to which he was appointed, as well as the nonperformance of acts upon which the jurisdiction of the board of reappraisement depended.

That portion of section 2900 which provides, in certain cases, for the imposition of an additional duty of 20% is in conflict with the Constitution of the United States, and is therefore void.

In the case of Maillard v. Lawrence, 8 Blatchf. 381, the percentage added under a similar statute was ruled not to be a penalty, but was regarded as an increase, on the contingency specified. In the case of Murray v. Hoboken Land & I. Co. 59 U. Hilton v. Merritt, 110 U. S. 107 (28:86).

Mr. Justice Blatchford delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action at law brought in the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York by the members of the copartnership firm of E. Oelbermann & Co., against the Collector of the Port of New York, in November, 1880, to recover the sum of $4,925.20, with interest, as an alleged excess of duties exacted by the Collector on an importation of 34 cases of silk and cotton velvets into the Port of New York from Germany, via Rotterdam, in June, 1879.

There were two invoices covered by one entry. One of the invoices was for 10 cases and the other for 24 cases. The Collector designated 2 cases from the invoice of 10 cases and 3 cases from the invoice of 24 cases for examination by the appraiser, which 5 cases were sent to the public store. The appraiser, after examination, raised the entered value of the merchandise more than 10 per cent, and reported such advance in value to the Collector. The plaintiffs thereupon gave notice to the Collector of their dissatisfaction with such appraisement. The Collector then selected Levi M. Bates, a merchant of New York City, to be associated as merchant appraiser with A. P. Ketchum, general appraiser, in examining and appraising the merchandise. Such proceedings were had that the general appraiser and the merchant appraiser disagreed, and made separate reports of their appraisement to the Collector, who decided between them and adopted the report of the general appraiser as to the value of the merchandise. The entered value of the invoice of the 10 cases was $3,477, and the entered value of the invoice of the 24 cases was $9,441, being an aggregate entered value of $12,918, upon which, at the time of entry, the plaintiffs paid a duty of 60 per cent ad valorem, the proper rate, amounting to $7,750.80. The value of the invoice of the 10 cases was advanced by the reappraisement to $4,032, and that of the invoice of the 24 cases to $11,522, making a total advanced value of the goods, after the reappraisement, of $15,554. Thus the entered value of each invoice was advanced by the reappraisement more than 10 per cent, and the Collector liquidated the duty on the goods at 60 per cent upon such advanced valuation, such duties amounting to $9,332.40, being an increase in the duty of $1,581.60. In addition to such regular duty, he levied an additional duty of 20 per cent, under section 2900 of the Revised Statutes, upon the $15,554, amounting to $3,110.80. The plaintiffs paid such two sums of $1,581.60 and $3,110.80, and filed a protest in writing on the 16th of October, 1879, in due time, against the alleged exaction. They also appealed from the decision of the Collector to the Secretary of the Treasury, and brought this suit within the time limited by law. They included in their suit a further sum of $232.80, which had reference to some other matter. At the trial, the court directed the jury to find a verdict for the defendant, which was done; and, after a judgment for the defendant, the plaintiffs sued out a writ of error.

It appeared in evidence at the trial that all the cases covered by the invoice of the 10 cases were, before the official appraisement was made, sent to the appraisers' store; that the merchant appraiser advanced the value of the 10 cases an average of 8.4 per cent, and the value of the 24 cases an average of 8.9 per cent; and that the general appraiser advanced the value of the 10 cases an average of 16 per cent, and the value of the 24 cases an average of 22.1 per cent.

Among the grounds of objection stated in the protest were these: (1) that the merchant appraiser was not a merchant duly qualified to appraise the merchandise in question, as required by law, inasmuch as he was not familiar with the character and value of the goods to be appraised; (2) that the appraisers, and each of them, did not diligently and faithfully examine and inspect such packages of the goods as were designated by the Collector on the invoices and were ordered to the public store to be opened, examined and appraised.

Section 2930 of the Revised Statutes provides, that the importer may, after the original appraisement of imported goods, give notice to the Collector in writing of his dissatisfaction therewith, and that, on the receipt of such notice, "the Collector shall select one discreet and experienced merchant to be associated with one of the general appraisers wherever practicable, or two discreet and experienced merchants, citizens of the United States, familiar with the character and value of the goods in question, to examine and appraise the same, agreeably to the foregoing provisions; and if they shall disagree, the Collector shall decide between them; and the appraisement thus determined shall be final and be deemed to be the true value, and the duties shall be levied thereon accordingly." It was under this provision of the statute that the foregoing proceedings took place.

After evidence to the purport before mentioned had been given, the plaintiffs called as a witness Mr. Bates, the merchant appraiser, who testified that he resided and carried on business in the City of New York, and that he served as merchant appraiser in this case, and received his appointment as such from the Collector. The witness was then asked in succession, by the plaintiffs' counsel, the following questions:

"Q. Will you state whether, at the time you were selected to act as merchant appraiser, you had any familiarity, and if so, how much familiarity, with silk velvets."

"Q. Will you state what familiarity you had with silk velvets at the time you were appointed merchant appraiser in this case?"

"Q. At the time you were appointed merchant appraiser were you familiar with the value of silk velvets?"

To each of these questions the counsel for the defendant objected, on the ground that each was incompetent and immaterial, and also upon the grounds (1) "that it is not competent now to try the question as to whether the person appointed by the Collector was familiar with the goods in question or not; that that is a question which must be determined by the Collector;" (2) "that if it were competent for the plaintiffs to try the question at all here, it is not competent for them to prove the incompetency of this appraiser by his own mouth." The court sustained the objection to each question, and the plaintiffs excepted to each ruling.

After the last question above recited had been objected to, and before it was ruled upon, the court said: "I will exclude that in that form, but I do not intend to cut you off from introducing any competent evidence of the fact that Mr. Bates was not a merchant; that is, an experienced man having some familiarity with these goods; that he was not of the class pointed out in the Act of Congress, as an experienced merchant."

The plaintiffs' counsel then asked the witness the following question:

"Q. Will you state to the court and jury what steps you took after you became merchant appraiser to examine the merchandise which was the subject of reappraisement?"

The defendant's counsel objected to this question "on the ground that it was incompetent and immaterial, and because the witness should not be allowed to impeach his own finding as merchant appraiser." Thereupon the court said: "As you put the question I shall exclude it; at the same time I should not exclude evidence that he made no examination at all or that he did not act at all." To this ruling the plaintiffs excepted.

The following question was then ruled out under the same objection, and the ruling was excepted to by the plaintiffs: "Q. What did you do in the way of examination of the merchandise which was the subject of that reappraisement?"

The following question was then put by the plaintiffs' counsel: "Q. Did you make any examination of any of the merchandise which was the subject of that reappraisement?" The witness answered that he did, and that his examination was at the appraisers' headquarters, on the west side of the town.

The following questions in succession were then asked the witness by the plaintiffs' counsel, and to each the same objection was taken by the defendant. Each was ruled out by the court, and to each ruling an exception was taken by the plaintiffs.

"Q. Did your examination of the goods, such as it was, take place in the wareroom at the appraisers' headquarters?"

"Q. Who was present?"

"Q. Were the importers?"

"Q. Or either of them?"

"Q. How many cases of merchandise belonging to this invoice did you find there?"

"Q. How many cases did you open or have opened for examination?"

"Q. How many pieces of velvet did you examine?"

"Q. Was that the only examination you made of those goods?"

"Q. Assuming that you had been examining those goods as a purchaser, and that you did not know who the owners were, and knew nothing of their responsibility, would you have purchased the goods from the examination that you made, if there was nobody behind you to fall back upon if there were any variations in the quality?"

The court then directed a verdict for the defendant, and the plaintiffs excepted to such direction.

Although the advance made in the valuation of each invoice by the merchant appraiser was less than 10 per cent, yet the importers were entitled to have a merchant appraiser with the qualifications prescribed by the statute, with a view to his legitimate influence with the general appraiser to limit his advance not only so that it should not exceed 10 per cent, with reference to the additional duty, but so that it should not exceed such sum as a merchant appraiser with those qualifications should deem just and fair. For the Collector is required, by section 2930, to decide between the two appraisers, if they disagree.

It was held by this court, in Hilton v. Merritt, 110 U. S. 97 [28:88], that the valuation of merchandise made by the customs officers under the statute for the purpose of levying duties thereon is, in the absence of fraud on the part of the officers, conclusive on the importer, and that sections 2931 and 3011 of the Revised Statutes, which give the right of appeal to the Secretary of the Treasury, when duties are alleged to have been illegally or erroneously exacted, and the right of trial by jury in case of adverse decision by the Secretary of the Treasury, do not relate to alleged errors in the appraisement of goods.

In that case, there was a reappraisement by a merchant appraiser, associated with one of the general appraisers, of an invoice of kid gloves, and the collector had thereafter adopted the appraisement returned in an amended report of the general appraiser, and, the advance of the invoice value being 16.2 per cent, had imposed an additional duty of 20 per cent, on account of undervaluation in the entry. At the trial, the plaintiffs offered to show the foreign market value of the goods. They also offered in evidence the records of the proceedings before the merchant appraiser and the general appraiser, including the testimony and various documents before those officers and subsequently before the collector, and also the testimony of the collector to show all the facts within his knowledge, or officially acted upon by him, in relation to the invoice in question, and to show what his experience was in valuing kid gloves. This evidence was excluded. The plaintiffs also claimed the right to go to the jury upon the questions (1) whether the collector, acting as appraiser, fully and fairly examined the goods; (2) whether the goods were invoiced at their fair and actual value in the principal markets of France at the time of exportation; (3) whether a fair examination of the goods was made by the general appraiser, associated with the merchant appraiser, when that question was referred to him; (4) whether the facts stated in the protests had been established by the evidence; (5) whether the appraisers followed the evidence before them or disregarded it, and whether the collector disregarded the evidence or was negligent in his appraisal.

This court, in its opinion, stated that the question presented by the plaintiffs' exceptions was, "whether the valuation of merchandise made by the customs officers under the Statutes of the United States for the purpose of levying duties thereon is, in the absence of fraud on the part of the officers, conclusive on the importer, or is such valuation reviewable in an action at law brought by the importer to recover back duties paid under protest."

On a consideration of all the sections of the Revised Statutes relating to the subject, embracing sections 2900, 2902, 2906, 2922, 2929, 2930, 2931, 2949, and 3011, the court came to the conclusion that the meaning of those sections was that the appraisement of the customs officers should be final, but that all other questions relating to the rate and amount of duties might, after the importer has taken the prescribed steps, be reviewed in an action at law brought to recover duties unlawfully exacted; that the valuation made by the customs officers was not open to question in an action at law, so long as the officers acted without fraud and "within the power conferred upon them by the statute;" that the evidence offered by the plaintiffs and ruled out by the court "tended only to show carelessness or irregularity in the discharge of their duties by the customs officers, but not that they were assuming powers not conferred by the statute;" and that the questions which the plaintiffs proposed to submit to the jury were immaterial and irrelevant. This view of the statutes on the subject, and to which we adhere, does not cover the material questions raised in this case.

Section 2930 of the Revised Statutes provides, that, on the receipt by the collector of the notice of dissatisfaction, he "shall select one discreet and experienced merchant to be associated with one of the general appraisers wherever practicable, or two discreet and experienced merchants, citizens of the United States, familiar with the character and value of the goods in question, to examine and appraise the same." The qualification prescribed by this section requires as well that the merchant appraiser associated with one of the general appraisers shall be a discreet and experienced merchant, and a citizen of the United States, and familiar with the character and value of the goods in question, as it does that the two merchant appraisers, who are to act without the general appraiser, shall be discreet and experienced merchants, and citizens of the United States, and familiar with the character and value of the goods in question.

This section 2930 was taken from section 17 of the Act of August 30, 1842, chap. 270, 5 Stat. at L. 564, and section 3 of the Act of March 3, 1851, chap. 38, 9 Stat. at L. 630. Section 17 of the Act of 1842 provided that, on the receipt by the collector of the notice of dissatisfaction, he should select "two discreet and experienced merchants, citizens of the United States, familiar with the character and value of the goods in question, to examine and appraise the same." Section 3 of the Act of 1851 provided that "wherever practicable, in cases of appeal from the decision of the United States appraisers," under the provisions of section 17 of the Act of August 30, 1842, "the collector shall select one discreet and experienced merchant, to be associated with one of the appraisers appointed under the provisions of this Act, who together shall appraise the goods in question."

It is quite apparent that the "one discreet and experienced merchant" referred to in section 3 of the Act of 1851 is to be a discreet and experienced merchant having the additional qualifications prescribed in section 17 of the Act of 1842; that is, that he is to be also a citizen of the United States and familiar with the character and value of the goods in question.

The importer is entitled to have a merchant appraiser who answers these qualifications, and is entitled to raise the question of a want of qualification by a protest and an appeal to the Secretary of the Treasury, and in a suit at law brought thereafter. If the merchant appraiser does not possess these qualifications, he has no power conferred on him by the statute to act as a merchant appraiser. The questions excluded by the court at the trial of this case, so far as they bore upon the question as to whether Mr. Bates was familiar with the goods in question or not, were competent; and the ruling of the court, which was to the effect that that question was to be determined solely by the Collector, was erroneous. The questions excluded by the court, as to whether Mr. Bates had any familiarity, and if so, how much, with silk velvets, and as to whether he was familiar with the value of silk velvets, were questions in the exact language of section 2930.

The remark of the court, that it did not intend to cut the plaintiffs off from any "competent evidence of the fact that Mr. Bates was not a merchant, that is, an experienced man, having some familiarity with these goods," and "that he was not of the class pointed out in the Act of Congress, as an experienced merchant," must be regarded as emphasizing the word "competent," in view of the objection taken, that, if it were competent for the plaintiffs to try at all the question as to whether Mr. Bates was familiar with the goods in question, it was not competent for them to prove his incapacity by his own mouth, and as sustaining that objection, and as holding that Mr. Bates was not a competent witness upon the subject of his familiarity with the character and value of silk velvets.

That the plaintiffs had a right, on the trial, to inquire whether the provisions of section 2930 had been complied with in this respect, has been determined by the decisions of this court in like cases. In Greely v. Thompson, 51 U. S. 10 How. 225 [13:397], the circuit court had instructed the jury, that the valuation made by two merchant appraisers, under the Act of 1842, was invalid because one of the merchants who made the appraisement was wrongfully substituted for another who had been appointed, and who was removed by the collector for having stated it to be his opinion that the plaintiffs should have time to obtain evidence from England as to the true market value of the goods. The judgment of the circuit court was affirmed by this court, on the ground, among others, that the removal of one of the merchant appraisers, and the appointment in his place of another, under the circumstances stated, was illegal. This was an examination into the competency of the appointment of the substituted merchant appraiser, of the same character with the inquiry into the competency of the merchant appraiser in the present case.

In Converse v. Burgess, 59 U. S. 18 How. 418 [15:455], which arose under the Act of 1842, the plaintiffs offered to prove that the merchant appraisers did not examine or see any of the original packages of the merchandise, which was sugar, but only saw samples which had been previously taken from one in ten of the packages described in the invoice, and that such samples would not, when exposed to the air, afford a fair criterion by which to judge of the importation, and claimed the right to go behind the return of the merchant appraisers, on the ground that they had not examined the sugar. Section 21 of the Act of August 30, 1842, chap. 270, 5 Stat. at L. 565, now embodied in section 2901 of the Revised Statutes, provided that the collector should designate on the invoice at least one package of every invoice, and one package at least of every ten packages imported, to be opened, examined, and appraised in the public stores. The defendant objected to the admission of the evidence, in the absence of fraud on the part of the appraisers, and claimed that their decision was in the nature of an award, and final under the statute, and not open to review under the protest. The protest alleged that the goods "were not fairly and faithfully examined by the appraisers." The circuit court ruled that the evidence was admissible, and that the plaintiffs might go to the jury on the question whether the examination made by the merchant appraisers was in substance and effect equivalent to an examination of one package in ten of the importation, and that, if it was not, the appraisement was void. The plaintiffs had a verdict and a judgment, and, on a writ of error by the collector, the judgment was affirmed by this court. The court observes, in its opinion, that the decision of the merchant appraisers is final "provided it is made in pursuance of law;" and, referring to the Acts of Congress on the subject, the court adds: "These Acts of Congress provide for the appointment, regulate the duties, and impose the limitations on the authority of the appraisers, and determine the conditions on which the validity of their assessment depends. All their powers are derived from these Acts, and it is their duty to observe the restrictions and to obey the directions they contain. In the present instance, there was a neglect of the positive mandate 'to open, examine and appraise one package of every invoice and one package at least of every ten packages of goods, wares and merchandise;' and the jury have found that the inquiry they made was not, in substance nor in effect, an equivalent for such an examination. We are, therefore, of the opinion that the importer was not precluded by their return from disputing the sufficiency or accuracy of their assessment."

If such nonobservance of the positive mandate of the statute in regard to the examination of so many of the original packages as the statute specified, as a condition on which the validity of the assessment depended, vitiated the appraisement, the nonobservance of the statute in regard to the qualifications of the merchant appraiser must be regarded as equally one of the conditions on which the validity of the assessment depends, and the plaintiff must have an equal right in either case to make proof, at the trial, of such nonobservance, if he has complied with the other statutory requirements necessary for the bringing of his suit. We do not lay down any absolute or comparative standard of familiarity with the character and value of the goods which must be applied to carry out the requirements of the statute. There must be, in every case, a substantial compliance with the statute. This does not necessarily require the highest degree of such familiarity. There must be, in good faith, in every case, the appointment of a person having the qualifications prescribed by the statute.

In regard to the question whether Mr. Bates was a competent witness to prove that he was not familiar with the character and value of silk velvets, we are of opinion that his evidence on that subject was admissible. As the question of his familiarity with the article and with its value necessarily depended upon the nature, and to some degree, at least, upon the extent, of his experience in connection with the article, no one could know what that experience was so well as himself. If he is to be excluded as a witness on the subject, when offered by either side, the court and the jury and the parties would be deprived of the best testimony within reach. There is no ground of public policy which forbids that the merchant appraiser should be a witness to the extent above indicated. The brief of the solicitor general does not urge that the witness was not a competent witness to that extent.

The question is somewhat analogous to that in the case of an arbitrator. It has been held that an arbitrator can be a witness as to the time when, and the circumstances in which, he made an award, with a view to show that, by the terms of the submission, he was not authorized to make the award (Woodbury v. Northy, 3 Me. 85); as to the fact that the arbitrators did not examine or act upon a certain matter (Roop v. Brubacker, 1 Rawle, 304); as to facts which occurred at or during the arbitration, and which tend to show the award to be void for legal cause (Strong v. Strong, 9 Cush. 560, 576); and as to whether a certain claim was included in the award (Hale v. Huse, 10 Gray, 99). See also Spurck v. Crook, 19 Ill. 415. The same principle has been applied in the case of a tribunal called a jury, appointed to assess damages and apportion benefits in the widening of a street (Canal Bank v. Albany, 9 Wend. 244); and in the case of commissioners appointed to condemn land for railroad purposes (Marquette, H. & O. R. R. Co. v. Probate Judge, 53 Mich. 217). In Duke of Buccleuch v. Metropolitan Board of Works, L. R. Eng. & I. App. 5 H. L. 418, it was held that an arbitrator may be a witness as to what passed before him and as to what matters were presented to him for consideration. See 2 Greenl. Ev. § 78 and notes.

We are also of opinion that the court erred in excluding the evidence of Mr. Bates, which was offered to show that he did not observe the requirements of section 2901 of the Revised Statutes, and did not open, examine, and appraise the packages designated by the Collector, and ordered to be sent to the public store for examination. The court observed that it would not exclude evidence that Mr. Bates made no examination at all, and thereupon the witness, in reply to a question whether he made any examination of any of the merchandise, answered that he did. But this ruling did not give to the plaintiffs that to which they were entitled. The subsequent questions which were excluded, as to how many cases he opened or had opened for examination, and as to the character of the examination he made, the object of which questions was to ascertain whether it was such an examination as the statute prescribed, were intended to show a noncompliance with the statute as to examination, within the terms of the protest. This the plaintiffs had a right to show. In Greely v. Thompson, 51 U. S. 10 How. 225 [13:397], the circuit court had instructed the jury that if both of the appraisers did not make some personal examination of the goods, their report or decision was not made in conformity to law, and did not justify the penalty; and the propriety of this instruction was approved by this court. In Converse v. Burgess, 59 U. S. 18 How. 413 [15:456], it was held, as we have seen, that the appraisement was vitiated by proof of a failure to open, examine, and appraise the packages designated by the collector, or to do what was an equivalent for such an examination.

We are also of opinion, for the reasons before stated, that Mr. Bates was a competent witness to prove the extent and character of the examination which he made of the goods in question. He may have been the only witness who could testify as to such examination, and certainly there was no witness who could know more on the subject.

We do not consider it necessary or proper to express an opinion upon any of the other questions raised by the counsel for the plaintiffs in error.

The judgment of the Circuit Court is reversed, and the case is remanded to that Court, with a direction to award a new trial.

JOHN CADWALADER, Collector of Dist. of Phila.

Merchant appraiser—evidence.

1. A merchant appraiser, under section 2930 of the Revised Statutes, must be a person familiar with the character and value of the goods in question.

2. In an action for an erroneous imposition of duties, the importer may show that the merchant appraiser was not familiar with the character and value of the goods.

Submitted Nov. 3, 1887. Decided Nov. 21, 1887.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Pennsylvania. Reversed.

The facts are fully stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Henry E. Tremain, Mason W. Tyler, Alexander P. Ketchum and Frank P. Prichard, for plaintiffs in error:

An appraiser is an officer, and can only be appointed by the President, or if an "inferior officer," by the head of a department, or a court of law.

The tribunal organized under section 2930, United States Revised Statutes, is an official board. Both members of the tribunal are United States officers.

By the statutes and by treasury regulations, considered either together or separately, merchant appraisers are officers.

The treasury regulations constitute the merchant appraiser a dignified and superior officer.

The court has established these merchant appraisers, as customs officers.

Hilton v. Merritt, 110 U. S. 97 (28:88).

These appraisers have become customs officers of power and authority inferior to none in the United States revenue system.

The merchant appraiser being an officer or employee in the customs service is amenable to the Civil Service Law.

Act Jan. 16, 1883, chap. 27.

Section 2930 is wholly inoperative because of its unconstitutional features.

Allen v. Louisiana, 103 U. S. 88 (26:319); Trademark Cases, 100 U. S. 98 (25:553); Virginia Coupon Cases, 114 U. S. 304 (29:197); Spraigue v. Thompson, 118 U. S. 95 (30:117).

Evidence was admissible as to the character and value of the merchandise.

Morrill v. Jones, 106 U. S. 466 (27:267); Oberteuffer v. Robertson, 116 U. S. 499 (29:706).

Actions at law of this character, founded on the illegality of the transaction, existed at common law prior to the Constitution; and are therefore guaranteed under the Seventh Amendment, which preserves the right of trial by jury in all suits at common law where the value in controversy shall exceed $20.

The designated packages ordered by the collector must be opened, examined, and appraised. This act of examination is jurisdictional.

Ystalifera Iron Co. v. Redfield, 23 Fed. Rep. 650.

Mr. G. A. Jenks, Solicitor-Gen., for defendant:

In the case of United States v. Hartwell, 73 U. S. 6 Wall. 393 (18:832), Justice Swayne declares: "An office is a public station or employment conferred by the appointment of the government. The term embraces the ideas of time, duration, emolument, and duties."

The case of United States v. Germaine, 99 U. S. 511 (25:483), refers to the case last cited, with approval as to the principle quoted.

The case of United States v. Maurice, 2 Brock. 103, recognizes the necessity of continuity and duration of duties as essential to the definition of an office.

That the determination of the appraisers or reappraisers is final as to value is firmly established by the cases of Hilton v. Merritt, 110 U. S. 97 (28:83); Herts v. Maxwell, 3 Blatchf. 187; Belcher v. Linn, 65 U. S. 24 How. 508 (16:754).

Mr. Justice Blatchford delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action at law brought in the Court of Common Pleas for the County of Philadelphia, in the State of Pennsylvania, by the members of the copartnership firm of Thomas J. Mustin & Co., against the Collector of the Port of Philadelphia, and removed into the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Pennsylvania, to recover the sum of $346.09, alleged to have been illegally exacted by the Collector as duty on worsted yarn imported by the plaintiffs from Bremen, and entered at the custom house July 1, 1886. There was a protest, an appeal to the Secretary of the Treasury, and a decision by him, before the suit was brought. The statute in force at the time, applicable to the goods in question, was Schedule K of section 2502 of the Revised Statutes, as enacted by the Act of March 3, 1883, chap. 121, 22 Stat. at L. 509, which imposes as duty on worsted yarns valued at above 40 cents per pound and not exceeding 60 cents per pound, 18 cents per pound, and in addition 35 per cent ad valorem; and on the same article valued at above 60 cents per pound and not exceeding 80 cents per pound, 24 cents per pound, and in addition 35 per cent ad valorem. The goods in question were entered as having cost not more than 60 cents per pound and as being dutiable at 18 cents per pound and 35 per cent ad valorem, making the dutiable value $922, and the amount of duty, $611.42, corresponding with the invoice. The appraiser advanced the valuation from $922 to $1,041, the increase changing the rate of duty from 18 cents per pound to 24 cents per pound, and resulting in a total duty of $749.31, instead of $611.42, and in an additional duty of 20 per cent, under section 2901 of the Revised Statutes, on the $1,041, or $208.20, making a total duty of $957.51, or $346.09 more than the amount stated by the plaintiffs on the entry as the proper duty. After the invoice had been advanced in value by the appraiser, the importers demanded a reappraisement, which took place before the general appraiser and a merchant appraiser, the latter being William F. Read. The claims of the plaintiffs on the trial were in accordance with the claims made in the protest.

At the trial, it appeared that, at the opening of the proceedings for the appraisement by the general appraiser and the merchant appraiser, the broker of the plaintiffs appeared before them and presented to them a written protest against the appointment of Mr. Read as merchant appraiser, which stated "that the said William F. Read is not an importer of or dealer in the particular quality or kind of yarn in dispute, and that he is not acquainted with the foreign market values of the same, and that, therefore, his appointment is not in conformity with the customs regulations on this subject." The protest cited article 466 of the general regulations under the customs laws, issued by the Treasury Department in 1884, and in force at the time of the plaintiff's importation, and which required that the merchant appraiser should be a "discreet and experienced merchant, a citizen of the United States, familiar with the character and value of the goods in question," and referred to section 2930 of the Revised Statutes. The plaintiffs offered this paper in evidence, and it was objected to by the defendant as immaterial, and also on the further ground that, as there had been a merchant appraisement, the same was final and conclusive as to the value of the goods, and that it could only be attacked upon the ground of fraud. The plaintiffs also offered to show that Mr. Read was not familiar with the character and value of the goods. This evidence was objected to by the defendant as immaterial and irrelevant. All of the evidence thus offered was ruled out by the court, on the ground that the Act of Congress had confided exclusively to the collector the selection of the merchant appraiser, and that the importer had no right to object to such selection; that the provisions of the statute were simply directory to the collector; that evidence tending to show that the person selected had not the requisite familiar knowledge of the subject-matter of the importation to enable him to discharge his duties satisfactorily could not be regarded as sufficient ground for assailing the action of the collector; and that his action in selecting a particular person to be merchant appraiser was not subject to revision in any court where the importer sought to recover what he claimed to be an erroneous imposition of duties. The plaintiffs excepted to these rulings. There was a verdict and a judgment for the defendant, to review which the plaintiffs have sued out a writ of error.

The question involved in the exclusion of the evidence offered, is the same question as that passed upon in the case of Oelbermann v. Merritt, [ante, 164] decided herewith. For the reasons stated in the opinion in that case, it must be held that the evidence was erroneously excluded.

Other questions were raised by the plaintiffs at the trial, and are discussed in the briefs of their counsel in this court, but we do not think it necessary or proper to pass upon any question other than the one above considered.

The judgment of the Circuit Court is reversed, and the case is remanded to that court, with a direction to award a new trial.

v.
MATHILDE DE MORANT ET AL.

Spanish titles—validity thereof—Act of 1860—part owner—sufficiency of petition—evidence of genuineness—surveys.

1. Where Spanish titles had been presented by the grantee to the commissioners for ascertaining claims and titles to land within the district of West Florida, held, that proof that the grantee actually built houses and resided upon the lands shortly after the date of the grant is sufficient evidence of cultivation as required by the grant.

2. Under the Act of 1860, the date of the cession of Florida to the United States, or the time of transferring possession, is the point from which to test the validity of such grants. The Treaty by which Florida was ceded to the United States was signed Feb. 22, 1819, and possession of the Territory was not taken until July, 1822, and acts constituting titles to the lands in question which were done prior to May, 1818, are within the time required by the Act of 1860.

3. The present case does not come within the proviso of section 3 of the Act of 1860, forbidding the commissioners to embrace in claims, which, in their opinion, ought to be confirmed, any claim previously presented and rejected as fraudulent, or that had been twice rejected by previous boards.

4. A part owner of the lands claimed, or the heirs or representatives of a part owner, may have the benefit of the proceedings authorized by the Act of 1860.

5. The failure to annex a sworn copy of the government surveys to the petition is not a question of jurisdiction in the court below, but a matter relating merely to the form of procedure.

6. The original testimonios which were given in evidence, the signatures to which were identified, and the English translation certified by the keeper of public archives of West Florida, in whose office the originals and the translations of all claims laid before the commissioners of 1824 were recorded, held, to be sufficient evidence that the alleged grants were genuine; particularly as their genuineness was not disputed before the commissioners nor in the court below.

7. The objection that the grants, if genuine, were void because not surveyed at the time fixed in the treaty, is not sustained, as the Act of 1860 makes the date of cession of the Territory, or of yielding possession thereof, the epoch to be observed.

Mr. Justice Bradley delivered the opinion of the court:

The petition in this case was filed in the District Court of the United States for the Northern District of Florida, for the confirmation of a Spanish grant, under the 11th section of the Act of June 22, 1860, entitled "An Act for the Final Adjustment of Private Land Claims in the States of Florida, Louisiana and Mississippi, and for Other Purposes." 12 Stat. at L. 85; and the appeal was taken directly from the decree of the district court to this court pursuant to the provisions of said section. The petition was filed November 22, 1869, within the time prescribed by the Act of March 2, 1867, 14 Stat. at L. 544. It is conceded by a stipulation filed of record in the cause that the petitioners are the legal representatives of Cerilo de Morant, Doqumeniel de Morant, and Laurent Millandon, who are deceased. The title of the petitioners is deduced from these deceased parties.

The petition states that on the 8th day of October, 1817, the King of Spain, by Don José Masot, Governor of West Florida, granted to Cerilo de Morant, then a subject of Spain, a certain tract of land containing 1600 arpents, situated northwest of Pensacola, in West Florida, about twelve miles and a half, bounded northwardly by lands previously granted to Don Emanuel Gonzales and by public lands, eastwardly and westwardly by public lands, and southwardly by lands granted to Desiderio Quina; that on the 1st of March, 1818, the said land was surveyed for the grantee by the deputy surveyor for West Florida, and that on the 6th of March, 1818, the said deputy surveyor delivered to the proper authorities his certificate and plan of said survey, a copy of which is annexed to the petition. That thereupon the grantee proceeded to clear, occupy, settle and cultivate the land. A copy of the expediente is annexed to the petition.

It then proceeds to state that another grant was made in the same manner on the 20th day of January, 1818, to Desiderio Quina, of 800 arpents of land, situated about eleven miles northwest of Pensacola, and surveyed for the grantee by the same deputy surveyor. The plats annexed show that the two tracts adjoin each other. The petition further states that Quina, on the 29th of October, 1818, sold and conveyed his grant to Cerilo de Morant; and that the latter subsequently sold and conveyed three undivided fourth parts of both tracts to Laurent Millandon, Louis Doqumeniel de Morant and John Chabaux, one undivided fourth to each; and that Laurent Millandon afterwards purchased the interest of Chabaux, and thus became owner of one undivided half of the land.

The petition further states that the heirs of Cerilo de Morant petition as well in behalf of the interests of the heirs of Louis Doqumeniel de Morant, and those of Laurent Millandon, as for themselves.

On the trial the petitioners produced in evidence their documentary title in Spanish, with English translations accompanying the same. The title of each tract consists of a testimonio in the usual form in such cases. The testimonio of the tract granted to Cerilo de Morant consists of, first, Morant's petition to the governor, for 1600 arpents of land, indicating the locality, and dated September 22, 1817; secondly, the governor's reference to the surveyor-general to ascertain if the lands were vacant, and to the fiscal, or attorney-general of the royal treasury, for his advice as to the legality and merits of the application; thirdly, the favorable answers of these functionaries; fourthly, an order of the governor that the applicant take the oath required by the fiscal, and that the surveyor-general proceed to the measurement and survey of the land, and to annex a figurative plan to his return; fifthly, a certificate of the oath taken by the applicant; sixthly, the return of the surveyor, dated March 6, 1818, stating the survey of the tract in detail, with a plat annexed; seventhly, the governor's certificate to the testimonio, declaring that it conforms with the original, and that it is issued at the request of the party at Pensacola, on the 5th of April, 1818. This testimonio is very full and particular. The other, issued to Quina, omits a report from the fiscal, as the petitioner merely stated the quantity of land desired, and left it to the governor to designate its location, who referred it to the surveyor-general. The latter located the land adjoining to the tract granted to Morant. A survey was made accordingly, and a testimonio issued to the grantee dated the first day of May, 1818.

Both of these testimonios (including the surveys) made complete titles under the Spanish laws.

The petitioners also produced in evidence certain acts of sale and transfer, to wit:

1. A sale by Quina to Cerilo de Morant for the tract of 800 arpents granted to the former. This act is dated 29th October, 1818.

2. A sale by Cerilo de Morant to John Chabaux, Laurence Millandon, and Louis Doquminel de Morant, Junior, of three undivided fourth parts of the tract of 800 arpents granted to Quina. This act of sale is dated November 9, 1818.

3. A sale by Cerilo de Morant to John Chabaux, Laurence Millandon and Company, of three undivided fourth parts of the tract of 1600 arpents, reserving to himself one undivided fourth part of the same. This act is dated June 14, 1821.

4. A marshal's deed, dated August 3, 1835, from James W. Evans, Marshal of the Western District of Florida, to Laurence Millandon, for the one undivided fourth part of both said tracts which belonged to John Chabaux. This deed recites a judgment against the executor of John Chabaux, recorded in the Superior Court of the Western District of Florida, in May Term, 1825, and an execution sued out in May, 1835, and a sale thereunder by said marshal to said Millandon, in pursuance of which the deed purports to have been made. The judgment and execution were not produced, but no objection to the admission of the deed was made on this account; and the practice in Florida as to proof of judicial sales by sheriffs seems to be very liberal. (See Hartley v. Ferrell, 9 Fla. 374, where a sheriff's deed was given in evidence without, so far as appears, the production of the judgment or execution.) The fact that the judgment was against the executor was no objection, since real estate was made assets in the hands of executors by the territorial Act of 1833, and equally liable with personal property to an execution upon a judgment against the executor. Act of Feb. 17, 1833, §§ 2, 4; Thomp. Dig. 202, 203.

In 1824, these Spanish titles were presented by Cerilo de Morant to the commissioners for ascertaining claims and titles to land within the district of West Florida, and were rejected by them, on the ground, as appears from their report, that no evidence was given of cultivation as required by the grants. Another reason assigned by the commissioners for rejecting grants in the list containing those in question, was that the claims had not emanated from His Catholic Majesty, or his lawful authorities in West Florida, prior to January 24, 1818, or that the order of survey had not been actually executed anterior to that period. See Commissioners' Report in American State Papers, Public Lands, Vol. IV. pp. 198, 199.

These objections are repeated before us, and are, amongst other things, assigned as grounds of error in the judgment of the court below. They may as well be disposed of here.

As to not cultivating the land, it was proved very conclusively on the trial that the grantees actually built houses and resided upon it shortly after the dates of the grants.

As to the dates of the surveys, it is true that they were both made after the 24th day of January, 1818, namely, in the beginning of March in that year, although the grants were made before that period. The objection is based upon the terms of the Treaty entered into with Spain, in 1819, by which Florida was ceded to the United States. By the eighth article of this Treaty it was stipulated that all grants of land made before the 24th of January, 1818, by His Catholic Majesty, or by his lawful authorities, in the ceded territories, should be ratified and confirmed to the persons in possession of the lands, to the same extent that the same grants would be valid if the territories had remained under the dominion of His Catholic Majesty; but all grants made since the 24th of January, 1818, when the first proposal on the part of His Catholic Majesty for the cession of the Floridas was made, were declared and agreed to be null and void.

The commissioners construed these provisions of the Treaty as invalidating grants made prior to the date named, if the surveys were not completed until after that date. This construction was opposed by the claimants who were affected by it, and a different view, perhaps, might well have been taken. But, be that as it may, the Act of 1860, under which the present proceedings were instituted, made the date of cession to the United States, or the time of transferring possession, the point from which to test the validity of grants. That Act was passed for the relief of parties who claimed lands in Florida, Louisiana, or Missouri, "by virtue of grant, concession, order of survey, permission to settle, or other written evidence of title, emanating from any foreign government, bearing date prior to the cession to the United States of the territory out of which said States were formed, or during the period when any such government claimed sovereignty or had the actual possession of the district or territory in which the lands so claimed were situated." See the Act, 12 Stat. at L. 85, §§ 1, 11. The Act of 1860 was intended to give relief to a large class of grantees of former governments, whose claims had been rejected by the different boards of commissioners, and by the courts, under the strict construction of the treaties, which prior laws had required. The history of the question is given at some length in the opinion of this court in the case of U. S. v. Lynde, 78 U. S. 11 Wall. 632 [20: 230], and need not be repeated here.

The Treaty by which the Floridas were ceded to the United States was not concluded and signed until the 22d day of February, 1819; and the ratifications were not exchanged until two years afterwards. The cession certainly did not take place, therefore, before the date named; and possession of the territory was not taken until July, 1822; whilst all the Acts constituting the titles in question were passed prior to May, 1818. We cannot hesitate to conclude, therefore, that these titles were completed within the time required by the Act of 1860.

We will proceed, then, to examine the other errors assigned on behalf of the Government.

1. It is contended that the court below had no jurisdiction of the case, (a) because the record does not show that the claim did not come within the purview of section 3 of the Act of 1860; (b) because the alleged claimants do not represent the whole title to the land claimed; (c) because no sworn copy of the government surveys was annexed to the petition. The first of these grounds is based on that clause of the eleventh section of the Act of 1860, which excludes from the jurisdiction of the district court claims which come within the purview of the third section of the Act. It requires only a momentary examination of that section to determine that the purview of it here referred to is the proviso, which declares, in substance, that in no case shall the commissioners embrace in classes one and two (namely, those which in their opinion ought to be confirmed) any claim previously presented to a board of commissioners, or other public officers acting under authority of Congress, and rejected as being fraudulent, or that had been rejected twice by previous boards. The present case does not come within either of these categories. The other matters assigned as grounds for want of jurisdiction are insufficient. We perceive no reason why a part owner, or the heirs or representatives of a part owner, should not have the benefit of the proceeding, even if the present petitioners did not show title to the entire interest in the lands; and the failure to annex a sworn copy of the government surveys to the petition is not a question of jurisdiction, but a matter relating merely to the form of procedure, which should have been objected to when the pleadings were in fieri, and the petitioners could have obtained leave to amend. A plat of the two grants, laid down in connection with the sections and subsections of the government surveys, certified as correct by a civil engineer and surveyor, was put in evidence at the trial without objection, and forms part of the record here. There seems to have been no controversy as to the location of the grants, either before the commissioners in 1824, or on the trial of the present cause.

The next assignment of error is, that there was no sufficient evidence that the alleged grants were genuine. This assignment cannot be sustained. The original testimonios seem to have been given in evidence at the trial, since the signatures to the same were identified by the witness Francisco Moreno, who had been attached to the public office in Pensacola under the Spanish Government as treasurer of the customs and auditor of accounts, and was familiar with this kind of documents. The English translations are certified by the keeper of public archives of West Florida, in whose office both the Spanish originals and the translations of all claims laid before the commissioners of 1824 were recorded in pursuance of the Act of March 3, 1825, 4 Stat. at L. 125. It may be added that the genuineness of these titles was not disputed before the said commissioners, and do not seem to have been disputed in this case in the court below, where these titles are familiar to the courts and members of the bar.

The last assignment of errors is, that the grants, if genuine, were void. It is contended that they were void, because they were indescriptive grants which had not been surveyed on the twenty-second day of January, 1818. We have already shown that, although this was the epoch fixed in the Treaty for determining the validity of grants, yet that the Act of 1860 made the date of cession of the territory, or of yielding possession thereof, the epoch to be observed under that Act; and as this latter epoch was certainly as late as the 22d of February, 1819, when the Treaty was concluded and signed, the objection falls to the ground. The land was actually surveyed and mapped, and segregated from the public domain in the spring of 1818. The old cases, therefore, which were formerly decided by this court, and which are referred to by the counsel of the Government, have no application to the case before us. Prior statutes, inconsistent with the provisions of the Act of 1860, no longer control our decision.

We do not think that any of the alleged errors are well founded.

The decree of the District Court is affirmed.

This decision merely confirms the validity of the grants, but does not entitle the parties to possession. If the Government has sold the lands in whole or in part, or if the surveyor-general shall ascertain that they cannot be surveyed and located, the petitioners, under section 6 of the Act of 1860, will be entitled to scrip for other public lands of equal extent to those so sold, etc.

In the Matter of WILLIAM M. HENRY, Petitioner.

1. The court below has jurisdiction to impose two distinct and separate sentences upon two distinct and separate indictments under section 5480, Revised Statutes, charging offenses committed within the same six calendar months which were tried at the same term of the court.

2. Each letter taken out of, or put in, the post office, for the purpose of carrying out a fraudulent scheme, contrary to the provisions of such section, is a distinct and separate violation thereof. Three distinct offenses committed within the same six months may be joined in the same indictment, and when joined there is to be a single sentence for all.

Submitted Nov. 10, 1887. Decided Nov. 21, 1887.

PETITION for a writ of habeas corpus. Dismissed.

The facts are fully stated in the opinion.

Mr. Isaac M. Bryan, for petitioner:

The question involved in this application is, the right of the court below to impose two distinct and separate sentences upon the petitioner, upon two distinct and separate indictments, both under section 5480, Revised Statutes of the United States.

A penal statute must be construed strictly.

U. S. v. Wiltberger, 18 U. S. 5 Wheat, 93 (5:42); U. S. v. Morris, 39 U. S. 14 Pet. 475 (10:548); U. S. v. Winn, 3 Sumn. 210; U. S. v. Hartwell, 73 U. S. 6 Wall. 395 (18:832); Bish. Stat. Crimes, 2d ed. § 82, and authorities there cited.

The construction must be humane.

U. S. v. O'Callahan, 6 McLean, 596; Bish. Stat. Crimes, 2d. ed. §§ 196, 54.

The court can give but a single sentence.

U. S. v. O'Callahan, 6 McLean, 598; Re Snow, 120 U. S. 282 (30:661); U. S. v. Stickle, 15 Fed. Rep. 801, 802.

The court below had no right to entertain the second indictment and impose a second sentence for offenses committed within the same six calendar months as those alleged in the first indictment; and the petitioner is entitled to his remedy by writ of habeas corpus.

Art. v. of Arts. in Addition to, and Amendment of, U. S. Const.; R. S. U. S., §§ 751-766; Ex Parte Milligan, 71 U. S. 4 Wall. 2, 142 (18:281,303); Ex Parte Lange, 85 U. S. 18 Wall. 163, 178 (21:872,879); Ex Parte Clarke, 100 U. S. 399, 422 (25:715, 783); Ex Parte Yarbrough, 110 U. S. 651, 666 (28:274,279); Ex Parte Wilson, 114 U. S. 417, 429 (29:89,93); Re Snow, 120 U. S. 274, 287 (30:658,663); Ex Parte Bain, 121 U. S. 1, 14 (30:849,853).

This is a motion for a rule to show cause why a writ of habeas corpus should not issue as prayed for. The case made by the petition is this:

Section 5480 of the Revised Statutes is as follows: "If any person having devised or intending to devise any scheme or artifice to defraud, or be effected by either opening or intending to open correspondence or communication with any other person, whether resident within or outside of the United States, by means of the post office establishment of the United States, or by inciting such other person to open communication with the person so devising or intending, shall, in and for executing such scheme or artifice, or attempting so to do, place any letter or packet in any post office of the United States, or take or receive any therefrom, such person, so misusing the post office establishment, shall be punishable by a fine of not more than five hundred dollars, and by imprisonment for not more than eighteen months, or by both such punishments. The indictment, information, or complaint may severally charge offenses to the number of three when committed within the same six calendar months; but the court thereupon shall give a single sentence, and shall proportion the the punishment especially to the degree in which the abuse of the post office establishment enters as an instrument into such fraudulent scheme and device."

Henry, the petitioner, was indicted in the District Court of the United States, for the Western District of South Carolina, on the 11th of September, 1886, for a violation of this statute. The indictment charged three separate and distinct offenses, all alleged to have been committed within the same six calendar months. Under this indictment he was tried, convicted, and sentenced to imprisonment in the South Carolina penitentiary at Columbia for the term of twelve months.

Afterwards, at the same term of the court, but on a different day, he was indicted for three other and different offenses under the same statute, committed within the same six calendar months. To this indictment he pleaded his conviction upon the first indictment in bar. This plea was overruled, and upon a trial he was convicted and sentenced to imprisonment in the Albany penitentiary, New York, for the term of fifteen months, upon the termination of his sentence under the first indictment.

He has served out his term under the first sentence, and is now confined in the penitentiary at Albany under the second. From this imprisonment he seeks to be discharged on habeas corpus, because, as he alleges, the court had no jurisdiction to inflict a punishment for more than one conviction of offenses under this statute, committed within the same six calendar months.

We have carefully considered the argument submitted by counsel in behalf of the petitioner, but are unable to agree with him in opinion that there can be but one punishment for all the offenses committed by a person under this statute within any one period of six calendar months. As was well said by the district judge on the trial of the indictment, "The Act forbids, not the general use of the post office for the purpose of carrying out a fraudulent scheme or device, but the putting in the post office of a letter or packet, or the taking out of a letter or packet from the post office, in furtherance of such a scheme. Each letter so taken out or put in constitutes a separate and distinct violation of the Act." It is not, as in the case of Re Snow, 120 U. S. 274 [30: 658], a continuous offense, but it consists of a single isolated act, and is repeated as often as the act is repeated.

It is indeed provided that three distinct offenses, committed within the same six months, may be joined in the same indictment; but this is no more than allowing the joinder of three offenses for the purposes of a trial. In its general effect this provision is not materially different from that of section 1024 of the Revised Statutes, which allows the joinder in one indictment of charges against a person "for two or more acts of transactions of the same class of crimes or offenses;" and the consolidation of two or more indictments found in such cases. Under the present statute three separate offenses, committed in the same six months, may be joined, but not more, and when joined there is to be a single sentence for all. That is the whole scope and meaning of the provision, and there is nothing whatever in it to indicate an intention to make a single continuous offense, and punishable only as such, out of what, without it, would have been several distinct offenses, each complete in itself.

The motion for a rule is denied and the petition dismissed.

Findings of fact in admiralty case—24th Sailing Rule—vessel in jeopardy—interest and costs.

1. The findings of fact, under the Act of Feb. 16, 1875, in an admiralty case, have the same effect as a special verdict in an action at law.

2. The 24th Sailing Rule applies only where there is some special cause rendering a departure necessary to avoid immediate danger, such as the nearness of shallow water, or a concealed rock, the approach of a third vessel, or something of that kind.

3. If one vessel has been brought into immediate jeopardy by the fault of another, she will not be held to blame, if she has done something wrong, or has not been maneuvered with perfect skill and presence of mind.

4. The allowance of interest and costs, in such a case, rests in the discretion of the court below, and its action will not be disturbed on appeal.

Argued Nov. 10, 11, 1887. Decided Nov. 21, 1887.

APPEALS from the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Maryland. Affirmed.

The facts are fully stated in the opinion.

Messrs. John H. Thomas and Robert H. Smith, for Dun et al.:

The decisions of this court are clear and uniform, that in a case like this, its jurisdiction on appeal depends upon the amount of the decree, not on that of any of the claims to participate in the fruits of it.

6 (27:78); Shields v. Thomas, 58 U. S. 17 How. 3 (15:93); Market Co. v. Hoffman, 101 U. S. 112 (25:782); The Connemara, 103 U. S. 754 (26:322); The Mamie, 105 U. S. 773 (26:937); Farmers' Loan & T. Co. v. Waterman, 106 U. S. 270 (27:117).

The jurisdiction of this court on appeal being clear, the motion to dismiss is a mere pretext to cover the motion to affirm.

Whitney v. Cook, 99 U. S. 607 (25:446).

The points raised are involved in the findings of fact and conclusions of law, and the exceptions were unnecessary.

The S. C. Tryon, 105 U. S. 267 (26:1026).

A formal exception is not necessary, if the want of jurisdiction is apparent from the record.

The Lucy, 75 U. S. 8 Wall. 309 (19:395).

Costs, in admiralty, are within the discretion of the court, and an appeal will not lie from either the refusal or allowance of them.

U. S. v. The Malek Adhel, 43 U. S. 2 How. 210 (11:239); The Sapphire, 85 U. S. 18 Wall. 56, 57 (21:816).

The rules prescribed by this court, under which the claimants sought and obtained a decree for the limitation of their liability, permit them, in the same proceedings, to contest any liability, and exempt them, whatever may be the result of that contestation, from any liability, after they have given the required stipulation, otherwise than as stipulators.

Admiralty Rules, 55–58; The Benefactor, 103 U. S. 239 (26:351); Providence & N. Y. S. S. Co. v. Hill Mfg. Co. 109 U. S. 578 (27:1038).

The circuit court was in error when it found, as a fact, that the vessels were approaching each other end on or nearly so, and on courses involving risk of collision.

The question of whether or not vessels, when approaching each other, are so meeting, is one of law, and not of fact.

The Nichols, 74 U. S. 7 Wall. 664 (19:159); The Dexter, 90 U. S. 23 Wall. 75 (23:85); The Delaware, Holt, R. of R. Cas. 66.

Mr. Wm. W. Macfarland, also filed the following brief for Dun et al.:

These words "end on or nearly end on" were found both in Rule 16 and Rule 18 of section 4233, in the former applying to sail vessels, and in the latter applying to vessels under steam.

The meaning of the words is the same in both rules. It means, as to navigation at night, such a position of vessels that each vessel is in a position to see both the side lights of the other vessel.

The America, 8 Ben. 429.

In the case of The Adriatic, the navigator on the steamer saw a green light two points on his starboard bow. He held his course, and was held not to have been in fault for so doing.

107 U. S. 512 (27:497).

A fortiori would the navigator have been free from fault in starboarding, for what would carry his vessel farther away from danger.

The Elizabeth Jones, 112 U. S. 514, 525 (28:812, 816).

The findings are to be considered in connection with the pleadings, and neither party is allowed to depart from the case he has set up.

The Vortigern, Swab. 518; The Scotland, 118 U. S. 507 (30:153).

Messrs. John Lathrop and Sebastian Brown for Walker et al.:

The principle on which this motion is made to dismiss has been fully settled by this court.

Under the rules of navigation and the authorities, The Smith is clearly liable for the consequences of this collision. Rule 16, article 11, in force when this collision took place, is as follows: "If two sail vessels, are meeting end on, or nearly end on, so as to involve risk of collision, the helms of both shall be put to port, so that each shall pass on the port side of the other."

U. S. R. S. 1st ed. 823; The Nichols, 74 U. S. 7 Wall. 656 (19:157); The Dexter, 90 U. S. 23 Wall. 69 (23:84); The Annie Lindsley, 104 U. S. 185 (26:716); The North Star, 106 U. Wheeler*, 4 Cliff. 189.

The 24th Rule applies only when there is some peculiar danger of navigation, which renders a departure necessary to avoid immediate danger, such as a rock, another vessel, a narrow channel, or something of that nature.

This court has also declared that rules of navigation are obligatory on vessels approaching each other, from the time the necessity for precaution begins.

New York & L. U. S. M. S. S. Co. v. Rumball, 62 U. S. 21 How. 372, 384 (16:144, 148); The Nichols, 74 U. S. 7 Wall. 656, 663 (19:157, 158).

The circuit court had no jurisdiction to entertain propositions of law without first opening the decree.

U. S. v. Carey, 110 U. S. 51 (28:67).

It is impossible for this court to say, as matter of law, that at two miles apart risk of collision was not involved.

The Nichols, supra; The Dexter, 90 U. S. 23 Wall. 69, 75 (23:84, 85).

The findings are construed in connection with the pleadings (The Adriatic, 107 U. S. 512 (27:497), and parties will not be permitted to contradict by proof what they have admitted in their pleadings.

McKinlay v. Morrish, 62 U. S. 21 How. 343 (16:100).

If one vessel is brought into immediate jeopardy by the fault of another, the fact that an order other than that which was given might have been more fortunate will not prevent recovery of full damages.

In the second case, the libelants and petitioners requested the court to decree against the claimants of The Maggie J. Smith, directing them to pay interest on the amount of the stipulation from the date of the stipulation, and costs in the district and circuit courts. The court clearly erred in refusing.

Although matters which are the subject of discretion in the court are not usually entertained, yet where, as here, the court has the whole case before it, it has control over such matters as well as the merits.

This case comes before us from the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Maryland. It is a libel against the vessel Maggie J. Smith, for damages caused by her collision with the schooner Enoch Robinson, which resulted in sinking the latter, and in the entire loss of both vessel and cargo. The libelants are the owners of The Enoch Robinson. The petitioners are the owners of the property on board, who have intervened for their interest. The claims of libelants and petitioners exceeded the value of The Maggie J. Smith and her freight; and thereupon the owners of that vessel instituted proceedings for the benefit of the limited liability provisions of the Revised Statutes, sections 4283–4289, under which the value of the vessel was appraised at $32,000, to which amount their liability was accordingly limited. A stipulation for that amount was thereupon given by sufficient sureties, with the condition that the claimants would perform the final order and decree in the case, or that execution might issue against the goods, lands and tenements of the stipulators, wherever found.

On the trial before the district court a decree was entered for the claimants, and the libel dismissed. On appeal, the circuit court reversed the decree, and adjudged that the libelants and petitioners were entitled to recover certain specified sums, which, in the aggregate, exceeded the $32,000; that the stipulators should pay that amount into the registry of the court, and that the clerk, after deducting the costs of the circuit and district courts, should pay the balance to the libelants and petitioners pro rata; that is, in proportion to their respective claims as allowed. From this decree the claimants have appealed to this court. Subsequently the libelants and petitioners applied to the circuit court for a further decree, directing the claimants to pay interest on the amount of the stipulation from its date, and the costs of the district and circuit courts, but the application was refused. From this refusal they have appealed to this court.

The circuit court having found the facts respecting the collision, our examination will first be directed to a consideration of their sufficiency to sustain the decree. The findings, under the Act of February 16, 1875, have the same effect as a special verdict in an action at law. (18 Stat. at L. chap. 77; The Adriatic, 107 U. S. 512 [27:497]. The bills of exception of the claimants in the record embrace only the refusal of the court below to find certain propositions of law, which can as well be presented to the court upon the present findings.

The findings of fact, with the facts admitted by the pleadings, disclose the following case: On the evening of February 26, 1883, The Maggie J. Smith, a three-masted schooner steamer, under sail only, ran into and sunk the three-masted schooner Enoch Robinson, off the coast of New Jersey. The night was clear and starlight; the wind was about northwest, and blowing a whole-sail breeze, and the sea was smooth. The Smith was on a voyage from New York to Newport News, Virginia; her course was southwest; her first mate, and her engineer, who was acting as second mate, were on deck; one man was at the wheel, and another was stationed forward on the lookout; her regulation lights were set; and she had the wind on her starboard side.

The Enoch Robinson was on a voyage from Baltimore to Providence, Rhode Island, with a cargo of coal. When The Maggie J. Smith was first seen by those on board The Robinson the latter vessel was on her regular course, heading northeast, and had the wind on her port. Her regulation lights were set and burning brightly; her master and second mate were on deck; a competent seaman was on the lookout forward on the top gallant forecastle; and one was at the wheel. The court finds that when the vessels were first seen from each other, they were about two miles apart; that they were approaching each other "end on, or nearly so, and on courses involving risks of collision;" that the wheel of The Robinson was put to port almost immediately after the position of The Smith was discovered, and that The Smith starboarded her wheel, and that this starboarding was the direct cause of the collision. The court also finds that when those in charge of The Robinson perceived that The Smith was falling off and that the vessels were approaching in dangerous proximity, they put the wheel of The Robinson hard-a-port, and let go the spanker sheet; and that a few seconds before the collision the wheel of The Smith was first put to port, and then hard-a-port, but the head sheets were not let go, and before the changes to port materially affected the course of The Smith the two vessels came together, The Smith striking The Robinson a square blow on the port side near the mizzen rigging. And the court finds as a conclusion of law that The Smith was in fault in not porting her wheel when The Robinson was first seen approaching her end on, or nearly end on, and was in fault for putting her wheel to starboard, and that this was the immediate cause of the collision.

Upon these findings, there could be but one conclusion as to the liability of The Smith under the Sixteenth Rule of Navigation adopted by Congress, which is as follows: "If two sail vessels are meeting end on, or nearly end on, so as to involve risk of collision, the helms of both shall be put to port so that each may pass on the port side of the other." R. S. 817.

Three cases in this court are cited by the counsel for the libelants in which this rule has been applied, under circumstances not materially different from those in the present case; The Nichols, 74 U. S. 7 Wall. 656 [19: 157]; The Dexter, 90 U. S. 23 Wall. 69 [23: 84]; and The Annie Lindsley, 104 U. S. 185 [26: 716]. In the case of The Nichols a schooner and a bark sailing on Lake Erie in nearly opposite directions came into collision by which the schooner was sunk. Each vessel was seen from the other, when two or three miles apart. The schooner had the wind free and on her starboard side; the bark was close hauled, with the wind on her port side. The vessels approached each other on lines that diverged not more than half a point, and at a combined speed of twelve miles an hour. The schooner starboarded her helm; the bark ported. The owner of the schooner filed a libel against the bark, but the court held that the schooner had violated the rule of navigation in not porting also, and therefore the owner had no claim for damages.

In the case of The Dexter two schooners came into collision on Chesapeake Bay, by which one was totally lost. When within a half mile of each other, they were approaching from opposite directions, end on, or nearly so. One ported and the other starboarded. It was held that the latter, which was lost, had violated the rule of navigation, and therefore was in fault, and that her owner could not maintain a libel for damages; and the libel filed by him was accordingly dismissed.

In the case of The Annie Lindsley there was a collision on Long Island Sound between a brig and a schooner, which resulted in the sinking of the schooner and the total loss of the vessel and cargo. The two vessels approaced each other nearly end on, on courses involving risk of collision; the schooner put her helm to port; the brig put her helm to starboard, thereby violating the Sixteenth Rule of Navigation, and a collision followed. It was held that the brig was liable for the loss.

Some reliance was placed by claimants' counsel on the Twenty Fourth Rule, which provides that, in construing and obeying the rules of navigation, "due regard must be had to all dangers of navigation, and to any special circumstances which may exist in any particular case, rendering a departure from them necessary in order to avoid immediate danger." Important as this qualification of the rules is, it has no application to the case at bar, where the vessels saw each other about two miles apart. It applies only where there is some special cause rendering a departure necessary to avoid immediate danger, such as the nearness of shallow water, or a concealed rock, the approach of a third vessel, or something of that kind.

The contention that if The Smith starboarded her helm when the two vessels, though approaching each other end on, or nearly so, were about two miles apart, her fault is not such as to make her responsible for the damages claimed, does not require consideration, for there is nothing in the record to show that when The Smith starboarded her helm the vessels were that distance apart. It is not stated what the distance then was, nor is the speed of the vessels given, from which such distance could be estimated. The contention assumes, without any foundation, that the vessels were then about two miles apart. The libel alleges that the vessels were running red to red three or four minutes before The Smith fell off her course and showed both her lights; and the answer states that the vessels had been in sight of each other some time when The Smith starboarded her helm, and that the vessels were then from a quarter to a half mile apart.

Nor is there anything in the position that, where two vessels are approaching in opposite directions so as to involve risk of collision, and one of them violates a rule of navigation in directing its helm, and the other vessel sees it, she will be in fault if she does not also turn her helm so as to avoid the consequences of such departure from the rule. Whether it would have been more prudent for The Robinson to take a different course, in consequence of the dangerous position in which she was placed by the disregard of the statutory rule on the part of The Smith, must depend upon the angle at which the vessels were approaching, their distance apart at the time, and their combined speed—circumstances not disclosed in the record. The rule is well stated by counsel, that "If one vessel is brought into immediate jeopardy by the fault of another, the fact that an order other than that which was given might have been more fortunate will not prevent the recovery of full damages;" or, as stated by the Court of Appeals of England, in the case of The Bywell Castle L. R. 4 P. Div. 219, as quoted in the case of The Elizabeth Jones, 112 U. S. 526 [28:816], "Where one ship has, by wrong maneuvers, placed another ship in a position of extreme danger, that other ship will not be held to blame if she has done something wrong, and has not been maneuvered with perfect skill and presence of mind."

As to the second appeal from the refusal to allow interest against the claimants upon the amount of the stipulation from the day it was filed in court, and the costs of the circuit and district courts, it is sufficient to say that the allowance of such interest and costs rested in the discretion of the court below, and its action will not be disturbed on appeal.

Jurisdiction as to amount.

Where a part of the property for which the suit was brought has been settled for after the commencement of the suit, and before judgment, so that the value of the remainder of the property does not exceed $5,000, the writ of error will be dismissed.

Submitted Nov. 16, 1887. Decided Nov. 21, 1887.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Northern District of Illinois.

On motion to dismiss. Granted.

The case is stated by the court.

Mr. Alexander McCoy, in support of motion to dismiss:

It was admitted for the purposes of this trial that a settlement had been made between plaintiff below and Plumb, in regard to the fifty-six head of cattle which were claimed by Plumb, so that the controversy remaining to be tried is in regard to the seventy-nine head claimed.

The net proceeds of the seventy-nine head were $4,526.15.

This finding of facts is conclusive.

Mercantile Mut. Ins. Co. v. Folsom, 85 U. S. 18 Wall. 237, (21:827).

The amount, as it affects the party prosecuting the writ of error, alone is to be considered.

Tintsman v. First Nat. Bank, 100 U. S. 6 (25:530); Pierce v. Wade, 100 U. S. 444 (25:735); Hilton v. Dickinson, 108 U. S. 165 (27:688).

Mr. R. A. Childs, in opposition:

In Hilton v. Dickinson, 108 U. S. 165 (27: 688), this court has said: "We have jurisdiction of a writ of error or appeal by a defendant when the recovery against him is as much in amount or value as is required to bring a case here."

Mr. Chief Justice Waite delivered the opinion of the court.

This motion is granted, on the ground that the record shows that the value of the matter in dispute does not exceed $5,000. The suit was brought originally to recover 135 head of Colorado steers, alleged to be worth $6,000. At the time of the judgment only 79 head were in dispute. As to the rest, a settlement had been made during the pendency of the suit. The court has found as a fact that the 79 head were sold in open market the day after they were taken possession of under the writ in this case, and that the net proceeds of the sale only amounted to $4,526.15. There is nothing to show that they were really any less valuable at the time of the sale than when they were taken. Upon the facts as found the recovery could not have exceeded $5,000 if there had been a judgment in favor of Cox, the plaintiff in error.

Dismissed.

Jurisdiction of circuit court—equity action, when not maintainable.

1. The Circuit Court of the United States may exercise jurisdiction in a suit in equity which is ancillary to an action at law of which it has already acquired jurisdiction, although one of the defendants in the suit in equity is a citizen of the district of which a portion of the complainants were citizens.

2. A suit in equity cannot be maintained for damages arising from the inferior quality of coke sold and delivered, and to subject property to the payment of the damages, where the coke was received, used, and paid for, without objection, and where there was no warranty as to its quality or suitableness, and the sale was not by sample. A cross bill, dependent upon the bill, was also properly dismissed.

The facts and case are fully stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Daniel Lamb, Wm. H. Hearne and Henry M. Russell, for Dewey, Vance & Co.:

This suit was ancillary to the action at law of which the Circuit Court of the United States already had undoubted jurisdiction; numerous decisions of this court establish the rule that such a suit will be entertained without regard to the citizenship of the parties.

Pacific R. R. Co. v. Missouri P. R. Co. 111 U. S. 506 (28:499); Krippendorf v. Hyde, 110 U. S. 276 (28: 145); Jones v. Andrews, 77 U. S. 10 Wall. 327 (19:935).

Where the person who applies for the injunction denies his legal liability, and has also an equitable defense, an injunction will be allowed without a confession of judgment.

Great Falls Mfg. Co. v. Henry, 25 Gratt. 575.

The insolvency of the defendant constitutes a sufficient reason for the exercise of equitable jurisdiction.

Lindsay v. Jackson, 2 Paige, 581; Gay v. Gay, 10 Paige, 369; Hudson v. Kline, 9 Gratt. 379.

The remedy at law was entirely inadequate to the exigencies of the case, and equity might properly take jurisdiction.

2 Lead. Cas. Eq. 4th ed. part II, p. 1848; Ragsdale v. Hagy, 9 Gratt. 409; Jaynes v. Brock, 10 Gratt. 211; Drexel v. Berney, 122 U. S. 241 (30:1219).

In cases of set-off, as well as in cases of recoupment and failure of consideration, the fact that the court of law has refused to admit the defense seems to constitute a reason, especially when other considerations exist, for the exercise of the extraordinary jurisdiction of the court of equity.

Taylor v. Okey, 13 Ves. Jr. 180; 2 Lead. Cas. Eq. 4th ed. part II, p. 1389, and citations.

An issue may be directed for the purpose, or the amount of damages may be inquired into by a master.

Kelsey v. Hobby, 41 U. S. 16 Pet. 269 (10:961).

If the letter of October 7, and the reply thereto, could be taken as a written memorandum of the contract, and as superseding the oral contract, yet this would not prevent the plaintiffs from showing that a sample had previously been furnished by the vendors, nor from showing that a warranty outside of the written contract had been made.

Foot v. Bentley, 44 N. Y. 166; Swett v. Shumway, 102 Mass. 368; Stoops v. Smith, 100 Mass. 63.

The representations and promises, coupled with the sample, constituted a warranty that the coke to be delivered under the contract should have the apparent qualities of the sample, and should be low in sulphur, and this whether the sample was low in sulphur or not.

The coke to be furnished was to be manufactured and furnished for a specific purpose which was known to both parties. The pur pose being known, a warranty arose that the coke should be of merchantable quality and reasonably fit to be used for the purpose for which it was intended.

Kellogg Bridge Co. v. Hamilton, 110 U. S. 108 (28:86); Shepherd v. Pybus, 3 Man. & G. 868; Jones v. Just, L. R. 3 Q. B. 197; Hogins v. Plympton, 11 Pick. 100; Chapin v. Dobson, 78 N. Y. 74; Gerst v. Jones, 32 Gratt. 518; White v. Miller, 71 N. Y. 118; S. C. 78 N. Y. 393; Randall v. Newson, L. The fact that the coke was of poor quality, and especially that it contained an excess of sulphur, constituted a breach of this warranty which gave the plaintiffs the right to recover the damages which they had sustained in the use of the coke, notwithstanding the fact that they had not rejected or returned it.

Kellogg Bridge Co. v. Hamilton, supra.

Messrs. Wm. P. Hubbard and James Morrow, Jr., for the West Fairmont Gas Coal Co.:

The receipt and use of the coke, and the long delay of the plaintiffs in objecting to its quality, amount to a waiver of objections.

The sale of the coke was not a "sale by sample" in the legal and proper sense of that term.

Barnard v. Kellogg, 77 U. S. 10 Wall. 383 (19:987).

Nor is there here any implied warranty that the coke should be reasonably fit for the purpose for which it was to be used. Where one, relying upon his own judgment, buys a specific article from a manufacturer, believing it will answer a particular purpose, he is bound to pay for it; and there is no warranty implied against the vendor.

Parol proof that the coke was warranted or sold by sample is inadmissible. In the court below Chapin v. Dobson, 78 N. Y. 74, was cited. That case is examined and criticised and shown not to be law, in chapter 12 of Jones on Commercial Contracts. See cases cited.

Where there is a written contract of sale without mention of sample, parol evidence is not admissible that the sale was by sample.

A warranty cannot now be superadded to the contract. The "trial lot" was wholly antecedent to the contract and separate from it.

Duty of vendees to reject. It was their duty to have rescinded the contract if their present pretensions be true, and not by their acquiescence and silence to ensnare their vendor into a ruinous liability in damages.

The cross bill is a sufficient basis for a decree. It should not have been dismissed.

Moore v. Huntington, 84 U. S. 17 Wall. 417, 421 (21:642,643); 2 Dan. Ch. Pr. 5th ed. 1553, note 3, and cases cited; Ragland v. Broadnax, 29 Gratt. 401, 419.

Mr. Justice Matthews delivered the opinion of the court:

In October, 1872, a contract was entered into between the firm of Dewey, Vance & Company and the West Fairmont Gas Coal Company, the terms of which are stated in a letter from the former to the president of the Coal Company, dated October 7, 1872 as follows: "We beg to ratify our verbal agreement of October 4, by which you are to deliver us until July, in 1873, an average of three cars of coke per day, at six cents per bushel of 41 pounds, we to settle for same by our note of 90 days from the first of each month for the previous month's delivery." This was acknowledged as an acceptance of a previous offer in identical terms by a letter from the president of the Coal Company to Dewey, Vance & Company. Under this contract the Coal Company were bound to deliver 681 carloads as ordered, equivalent to 424,944 bushels, which at the contract price would amount to $25,496.64. From the date of the contract to November 30, 1873, the Coal Company delivered in all 246 carloads, which had been ordered and were received and paid for according to the terms of the contract, the period during which deliveries were to have taken place having been extended by mutual consent. Dewey, Vance & Company refusing to order or receive any more, the Coal Company, on January 17, 1877, brought an action at law against them in the Circuit Court of Ohio County, West Virginia, for damages for the breach of the contract. The defendants in that action caused it to be removed from the state court to the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of West Virginia on June 7, 1877, on the ground that the parties were citizens of different States, the West Fairmont Gas Coal Company, the plaintiff, being a corporation of the State of New York, and the defendants citizens of West Virginia and Ohio. Thereupon, on October 3, 1877, the surviving partners of the firm of Dewey, Vance & Company filed the present bill in equity against the West Fairmont Gas Coal Company, the plaintiff in the action at law, and the West Fairmont and Marion Consolidated Gas Coal Company, a corporation organized under the laws of West Virginia, alleging that under the contract of October 4, 1872, the sale of coke was by sample, the quality of which was to be equal to that of a certain trial lot previously tested, accompanied by an implied warranty that the coke to be delivered under the contract should also be fit and suitable for the purpose of being used in the furnace of Dewey, Vance & Company for making pig iron; that in point of fact the coke actually delivered under the contract was not equal to the quality of the sample, and was not fit for the purposes for which it was to be used; that in consequence thereof the complainants had ceased and refused to order or receive any more than that delivered and paid for, and that by reason of the bad quality of the coke actually received and used they had suffered a large amount of damages; that the West Fairmont Gas Coal Company in the mean time had become and was insolvent, and that they had made a fraudulent assignment of their property to their codefendant, the West Fairmont and Marion Consolidated Gas Coal Company. The prayer of the bill was that the amount of damages sustained by the complainant might be ascertained, that the assets of the West Fairmont Gas Coal Company, so fraudulently assigned, be subjected to the payment thereof, and that in the mean time all proceedings in the action at law brought by the West Fairmont Gas Coal Company should be stayed.

The right to maintain such a creditor's bill is based upon the Code of West Virginia, chapter 138, section 2, which provides that "A creditor, before obtaining a judgment or decree for his claim, may institute any suit to avoid a gift, conveyance, assignment, or transfer of or charge upon the estate of his debtor, which he might institute after obtaining such judgment or decree, and he may, in such suit, have all the relief in respect to said estate which he would be entitled to after obtaining a judgment or decree for the claim which he may be entitled to recover."

To this bill the defendants in the first instance objected, by way of plea and demurrer, for want of jurisdiction in the court, on the ground that one of the defendants, the West Fairmont and Marion Consolidated Gas Coal Company, was a citizen of the State of West Virginia, of which also a portion of the complainants were citizens. This objection, however, is not well taken. The suit in equity was an exercise of jurisdiction on the part of the circuit court, ancillary to that which it had already acquired in the action at law, which it might well entertain according to the rule adjudged in Krippendorf v. Hyde, 110 U. S. 276 [28: 145] and Pacific R.R. Co. v. Missouri P. R. Co. 111 U. S. 506 [28: 499].

The defendants having answered, denying the equity of the bill, set up their right to recover damages for the alleged breach of the contract on the part of Dewey, Vance & Company, in refusing to receive the remainder of the coke deliverable under the contract, by way of cross bill, in which they sought a decree for the amount thereof. Issues having been made upon the bill and cross bill, the cause was heard upon its merits, when the circuit court rendered a decree dismissing the bill for want of equity, and the cross bill, with costs, to the original defendants as dependent thereon. From this decree an appeal is prosecuted by the original complainants, and also by the defendants, by way of cross appeal, from so much as dismisses their cross bill.

From a careful examination of all the evidence in the cause, we are satisfied with the conclusions of the circuit court. We find as matter of fact that the sale of coke was not by sample. A trial lot of 34 carloads, prior to the making of the contract, was furnished and used, the complainants being satisfied with it; but there was no agreement, either express or implied, that all deliveries under the contract should be equal to it in quality. The object of the test evidently was to determine, on the part of the complainants for themselves, whether they were willing to run the risk of using coke to be manufactured by the Coal Company from the slack of their mines, at the price offered. The coke which was subsequently furnished under the contract was used by the complainants and paid for according to the contract without objection, except as to a lot furnished in December, 1872, which was complained of as being inferior. On investigation it turned out to have been made from material taken from a slack pile outside of the mine which had been for some time exposed, and had become unfit for the purpose. Thereafter no material was used except the fresh slack taken from the inside of the mines, and deliveries continued to be made as ordered until the last which took place in November, 1873. There was no warranty expressed, nor can any be reasonably implied from the circumstances, that the coke under the contract should be suitable for use in the furnace for making pig iron. On the contrary, it was expressly understood that it would not be suitable for that purpose by itself. The only question to be determined was whether it could be used in combination with Connellsville coke, which was the standard for that purpose, and if so, in what proportions; to determine this was the object of testing the trial lot. The complainants continued to use it, as already stated, from time to time, without objection or complaint, paying for what they received according to the terms of the contract, and not at any time giving notice of any intention to refuse the further performance of the contract, although ceasing to give any orders after November, 1873. On November 28, 1873, the Coal Company, in a letter from its president to Dewey, Vance & Company, asked for the reason for the order to discontinue shipping in reply to which, on December 4, 1873, Dewey, Vance & Company wrote: Yours of the 28th inst. was duly received. We were accumulating stock, and stopped shipments from Fairmont and curtailed from Connellsville; have no definite idea at what time we shall again need." No further communications appear to have taken place between the parties until the beginning of the action at law.

We think the circuit court did not err upon the merits in dismissing the complainants' bill; and, as the cross bill was dependent upon it and sought no relief purely equitable, it was also properly dismissed, with costs to the complainant therein, thereby remitting it to its remedy in the pending action at law.

COLORADO COAL AND IRON COMPANY ET AL., Appts.,
v.
UNITED STATES.

Fraud in preemption claims—bona fide purchaser—presumptions in favor of—burden of proof—insufficient proof—mining lands—new discoveries.

1. Where there were in fact no actual settlements and improvements on any of the lands, as falsely set out in the affidavits in support of preemption claims and in the certificates issued thereon, this constitutes a fraud upon the United States, sufficient in equity, as against the parties perpetrating it, or those claiming under them with notice of it, to justify the cancellation of the patents issued to them. But it is not such a fraud as prevents the passing of the legal title by the patents.

2. To a bill in equity to cancel the patents upon these grounds alone, the defense of a bona fide purchaser for value, without notice, is perfect.

3. The title of such a purchaser rests upon the strongest presumptions of fact, which, although they may be rebutted, nevertheless can be overthrown only by full proofs to the contrary, clear, convincing and unambiguous. The burden of producing these proofs and establishing the conclusion rests upon the Government, in an action by it to cancel a patent which it has issued, and it is not relieved of this burden by the negative nature of the proposition it is bound to establish.

4. To raise a suspicion, however strong, of the fraud and wrong doing of its own officers is not enough to justify the Government in casting upon the defendants the burden of establishing their title. The proof of a fraud which would render their title void should be stronger than the legal presumptions on which it rests.

5. Where the Government did not make all the proof of which the nature of the case was susceptible and which was within its reach, and the good faith of the defendants is unimpeached, held, under the circumstances, that a decree canceling the patent should be reversed.

6. It is not sufficient to constitute "known mines" of coal, within the meaning of the statute, that there should be merely indications of coal beds or coal fields, of greater or less extent and value, as shown by outcroppings. To constitute the exemption contemplated by the preemption Act under the head of "known mines," there should be, upon the land, ascertained coal deposits of such extent and value as to make the land more valuable as a coal mine than for agricultural purposes.

7. New discoveries, after the sale, by which the land becomes profitable to work as a mine, cannot affect the title as it passed at the time of the sale.

The facts and case are fully stated by the court.

Messrs. B. H. Bristow, Lyman K. Bass and David Willcox, for appellants:

There can be no relief against these defendants by reason of alleged false statements in the proofs of preemption. The defendants' rights as bona fide purchasers are sufficiently pleaded.

Boone v. Chiles, 35 U. S. 10 Pet. 177, 210 (9: 388, 400); Graffam v. Burgess, 117 U. S. 180, 195 (29: 839, 844).

The burden of proving notice was upon the complainant.

Calais Steamboat Co. v. Scudder, 67 U. S. 2 Black, 372 (17: 282); Dexter v. Harris, 2 Mason, 531, 536; Flagg v. Mann, 2 Sumn. 487, 551.

The deeds establish these facts presumptively.

Jackson was a bona fide purchaser; his rights in that behalf inure to his grantees.

Alexander v. Pendleton, 12 U. S. 8 Cranch, 462 (3: 624); Cole v. Gourlay, 79 N. Y. 527; Pom. Eq. § 754; Oliver v. Piatt, 44 U. S. 3 How. 410 (11: 657); White v. McGarry, 2 Flipp. 572; Chapman v. Sims, 53 Miss. 154.

The consolidated Company was not an incumbrancer pendente lite.

Games v. Stiles, 39 U. S. 14 Pet. 322 (10: 476); Miller v. Sherry, 69 U. S. 2 Wall. 250 (17: 830); Murray v. Ballou, 1 Johns. Ch. 566.

Any right to relief by reason of false statements in the preemption papers would of course be equitable only. It therefore could not be asserted against a bona fide purchaser.

Fletcher v. Peck, 10 U. S. 6 Cranch, 133 (3: 177); Dexter v. Harris, supra; Wood v. Mann, 1 Sumn. 506; Pom. Eq. § 777; U. S. v. Minor, 114 U. S. 233 (29: 110); S. C. 29 Fed. Rep. 134; Beard v. Federy, 70 U. S. 3 Wall. 491, 492 (18: 92); Smith v. Ewing, 23 Fed. Rep. 741–747; Somes v. Brewer, 2 Pick. 184; Deputy v. Staples-ford, 19 Cal. 302; 2 Story, Eq. § 1502; 2 Washb. Real Prop. 597.

There is no proof that these lands were not subject to preemption.

The statute provides that lands on which are situated any "known mines" shall not be liable to entry thereunder.

Act Sept. 4, 1841, 5 Stat. at L. 456, § 10.

The exception refers to the condition of the land at the time of the entry. This was ruled in Deffeback v. Hawke, 115 U. S. 392 (29: 423); Western Pac. R. R. Co. v. U. S. 108 U. S. 510, 513 (27: 806, 807); U. S. v. Reed, 28 Fed. Rep. 482.

The mere presence of minerals in unascertained quantities does not make a given spot a mine.

It is not shown that there were any "known" mines. The meaning of this expression has never been determined.

The stability of titles by patent is of the highest public importance.

St. Louis Smelting & Ref. Co. v. Kemp, 104 U. S. 641 (26: 876); Steel v. St. Louis Smelting & Ref. Co. 106 U. S. 447 (27: 226); U. S. v. Maxwell Land Grant Co. 121 U. S. 379 (30: 958); 3 Ops. Attys-Gen. 420; Sullivan v. Iron Silver Min. Co. supra.

The complainant cannot recover upon the ground that the patentees were fictitious.

U. S. v. Maxwell Land Grant Co. 121 U. S. 325, 379 (30: 949, 958); U. S. v. Throckmorton, 98 U. S. 61 (25: 93); U. S. v. Stone, 69 U. S. 2 Wall. 525, 535 (17: 765, 767); Johnson v. Towsley, 80 U. S. 13 Wall. 72 (20: 485).

The proof of wrong or mistake should be clear and satisfactory.

U. S. v. Iron Silver Min. Co. 24 Fed. Rep. 568; U. S. v. Maxwell Land Grant Co. 26 Fed. Rep. 123.

A patent conveys the legal title notwithstanding that it is obtained by fraud.

The grant would be equally effectual to pass the legal title whether the grantee called himself by his ordinary name or by one assumed for the occasion.

There is nothing in Moffat v. U. S. 112 U. S. 24 (28: 623) contrary to the views now urged.

The complainant is not entitled to relief in equity. A grantor cannot question his grant.

When the acts of fraud now alleged were discovered the bill does not state. Presumptively, therefore, they have been known to the complainant ever since the patents were issued.

Coal land is valuable mineral land.

Mullan v. U. S. 118 U. S. 217 (30:172).

This is a bill in equity filed in the name of the United States by the Attorney-General on January 22, 1880, the object and prayer of which are to declare void and cancel sixty-one patents for as many distinct pieces of land, situated at different places in Las Animas County, in the State of Colorado, amounting in the aggregate to 9,565$\frac{25}{100}$ acres. To the original bill the Southern Colorado Coal and Town Company, a corporation organized under the laws of Colorado, was the sole defendant. The patents in question were issued at different times between October, 1873, and October, 1874; upon preemption claims, under the Act of 1841. In each case there appeared to be filed all the necessary and proper affidavits, duly verified before the register or receiver of the land-office at Pueblo, showing that the preemptors had entered and settled in person upon the land on a day named, and had made improvements thereon, the nature of which were set out in detail, and that the lands in question were non-mineral lands, and subject to preemption under the Acts of Congress relating thereto. Between May, 1873, and December 1875, warranty deeds in the names of the preemptors and patentees were made, acknowledged, and recorded apparently conveying the premises to William S. Jackson, as trustee, who represented a number of individuals who had deposited money in his hands to be used in the purchase of lands in Colorado. On June 1, 1876, by deed duly acknowledged and recorded, but without covenant of warranty, Jackson conveyed and released all these lands to the defendant, the Southern Colorado Coal and Town Company. On January 20, 1880, that corporation was consolidated with other corporations under the name of the Colorado Coal and Iron Company, to which, upon that date, the lands in question were conveyed. Under date of February 1, 1880, the Coal and Iron Company made a mortgage covering the premises in question, with others, to Louis H. Meyer, as trustee, to secure an issue of bonds amounting to $3,500,000. On January 7, 1882, an amendment to the bill was filed, making the Colorado Coal and Iron Company, the consolidated corporation, together with Meyer, the trustee in the mortgage, parties defendant. The purchase price of the land to the Government was $11,997.45, which was paid at the time to the proper officer, $1,813.14 in cash, and the remainder in certificates known as agricultural college scrip, which by law was receivable for that purpose.

It is charged in the bill that these patents were procured by means of a fraudulent conspiracy entered into by and between Irving W. Stanton, register of the land-office, Charles A. Cook, receiver for the land district, at Peublo, in Colorado, Alexander C. Hunt, and others unknown, who, it is alleged, organized and had incorporated the Southern Colorado Coal and Town Company. In furtherance of this conspiracy, and as the means of accomplishing its purpose, it is alleged "That neither of the supposed preemptors of the land as aforesaid described by their names, as stated in said several proofs of preemption, or in the said certificates of location, ever settled upon the said lands or improved the same, as represented in said several proofs of preemption, and that no person or persons whatsoever, as represented in either of said certificates of location, appeared or presented himself before said Stanton or Cook, or either of them, at any time, and made proof of preemption or agricultural college scrip location, either as preemptor or as witness for any preemptor as aforesaid described, as in and by said proofs of preemption and location certificates, or either of them, as aforesaid, is supposed, but that the same, and each of them, are false and fraudulent, and were designed, made, and executed by said Stanton and Cook and said Hunt, and the said persons to your orator unknown, or some one or more of them, in the manner aforesaid, and for the purpose of fraudulently depriving your orator of its title to the said pieces of land."

It is further alleged that all the said supposed preemptors are fictitious persons, and their names are fictitious names, and that the supposed names that appear as witnesses to the said several proofs of preemption are fictitious names, and that no such person or persons, either as preemptors or as witnesses, have ever lived or been known in the County of Las Animas, where said pieces and parcels of land are located, and, in fact, that no such persons exist.

It is further alleged in the bill "That the aforesaid pieces and parcels of land are not agricultural land, and are not suitable for agricultural or grazing purposes, and are of no value for any purpose except for the coal deposits therein contained. * * * That the said several pieces and parcels of land contain large and valuable deposits of coal, and that the said deposits of coal were known to the said Stanton and Cook and said Hunt, and to the said person or persons to your orator unknown, who wrote out, signed, and executed, or caused to be written out, signed, and executed, the several proofs of preemption and non-mineral affidavits at the time the said several proofs of preemption and non-mineral affidavits were made out, signed, and executed."

It is also charged in the bill that the said Hunt was a stockholder in the Southern Colorado Coal and Town Company, and general manager of its business, and that the incorporators of said company and the trustees thereof, including William S. Jackson, "knew at the time the aforesaid described land was conveyed to said company by said William S. Jackson, as hereinbefore described, that the several patents to said several pieces and parcels of land had been fraudulently obtained from your orator, and knew that the said several supposed preemptors and patentees were myths and fictitious persons, and knew that the said Jackson had no right, title or interest in said land, or any part thereof."

The answer of the Southern Colorado Coal and Town Company, filed November 2, 1881, specifically denies all the allegations of the bill alleging fraud, and denies that the said lands or any portion of them were mineral lands in the sense of not being lands capable of being acquired under the preemption law, and sets up by way of further defense that it was a purchaser of all the said lands in good faith for a valuable consideration without any knowledge or notice whatever of any or either of the pretended fraudulent acts and conspiracies in the bill alleged. Louis H. Meyer, on June 5, 1882, answered to the same effect, and by a stipulation the answer of the Southern Colorado Coal and Town Company was directed to stand as the answer of the Colorado Coal and Iron Company. Replications were duly filed, and the cause was heard on a large amount of proofs, resulting in a decree in favor of the complainant, declaring all the patents in the bill mentioned, and the subsequent conveyances of the land therein described to the defendants, to be fraudulent and void, and decreeing that they should be held for naught and be delivered up to be canceled. The present appeal is from that decree.

It was held by the circuit court that the charge in the bill, that the supposed preemptors and patentees were fictitious persons, having no existence, was sufficiently proved; that, consequently, there being no grantees, no legal title passed from the United States; and that, as the defendants acquired no legal title by virtue of the supposed conveyances to them, they cannot claim protection as bona fide purchasers for value without notice of the fraud. U. S. v. Southern Col. Coal & Town Co. 18 Fed. Rep. 278.

It is fully established by the evidence that there were in fact no actual settlements and improvements on any of the lands, as falsely set out in the affidavits in support of the preemption claims and in the certificates issued thereon. This undoubtedly constituted a fraud upon the United States, sufficient in equity as against the parties perpetrating it, or those claiming under them with notice of it, to justify the cancellation of the patents issued to them. But it is not such a fraud as prevents the passing of the legal title by the patents. It follows that to a bill in equity to cancel the patents upon these grounds alone the defense of bona fide purchaser for value without notice is perfect.

In reference to such a case, it was said by this court, in U. S. v. Minor, 114 U. S. 233, 248 [29:110, 114]: "Where the patent is the result of nothing but fraud and perjury, it is enough to hold that it conveys the legal title; and it would be going quite too far to say that it cannot be assailed by a proceeding in equity and set aside as void, if the fraud is proved and there are no innocent holders for value." Meader v. Norton, 78 U. S. 11 Wall. 442, 458 [20:184, 188]. It is, indeed, an elementary doctrine of equity that where a grantor has been induced by fraud to part with the legal title to his property, he cannot reclaim it from subsequent innocent purchasers for value. Hence it becomes necessary, to support the decree of the circuit court, to maintain as that court declared, that the legal title to the lands in question did not pass from the United States by virtue of the patents, because there were in fact no grantees. And it was that proposition of fact which, by the proofs introduced into the cause, the United States undertook to establish. The evidence on that point is found in the depositions of fourteen persons examined as witnesses. They were called to prove, and did prove, in the first place, in respect to the several tracts of land in controversy, the facts that they had not been settled upon, and that no improvements had been made upon them by any person. They also testified, in substance, that they were acquainted at the time of the transactions, with the lands, and were acquainted with the people then living in Las Animas County, some of them stating that they knew every white man residing at that time therein; that with the exception of one person, named Martine, there were no persons in the county at the time bearing the names specified as preemption claimants, and no persons bearing the names subscribed as witnesses to their statements; and that they never saw or heard of persons residing in the county having such names. This is the extent of this description of evidence, the weight of which is to be estimated in connection with the fact that the County of Las Animas, although sparsely settled, embraces an area extending about 150 miles from east to west and about 40 miles from north to south. In corroboration of it testimony was introduced, on behalf of the United States, of experts in handwriting, with a view of establishing, by a comparison of the documents, that they were fabricated, which, however, was met by the opposing opinions of other experts called on the part of the defendants. This evidence we think not only inconclusive, but entitled to no weight, not at all supporting the inference sought to be drawn: that the same handwriting is traceable in the signatures of the various names. The conclusion, if warranted at all, must depend upon the statements of the other witnesses, the substance of whose testimony has already been given, and such presumptions of fact or law as legitimately arise thereon.

It is charged in the bill that these title papers were falsely and fraudulently made by the register and receiver combining with Hunt and others unknown in a conspiracy for that purpose, but there is no direct proof of such a conspiracy. It is sought to be inferred from the fact that the preemption statements were falsely made, and from the evidence tending to show that the persons named were fictitious. There is no proof to connect the register and receiver with such a conspiracy, except the fact that the affidavits purport to have been made before them, and were certified to by them. Hunt's connection with it rests upon the fact that he procured deeds from the supposed patentees, conveying the lands to Jackson in pursuance of a bargain with him. It may well be admitted that if there were no actual persons who made applications as preemption settlers, none who made and signed the necessary declarations and affidavits, and no persons as witnesses who attested the same, the register and receiver must have known the fact; but the fact of the conspiracy depends upon prior proof that the alleged transactions were mere fictions. The proof necessary to justify that conclusion is supposed to be found in the facts testified to by the witnesses, a summary of which has been given.

It certainly does not follow that no such persons in fact existed, as a necessary conclusion from the testimony of these witnesses that they knew no such person as named in these papers. The utmost that can be said, as was said by the learned judge of the circuit court in delivering judgment in the case, is that "If none of them were ever in the county, and no improvements were ever made upon the land, then the proofs upon which the patents issued were false, and the inference that the papers were manufactured without the presence of any persons bearing or assuming the names of the patentees is not more unreasonable than would be the inference that sixty-one actual persons committed perjury themselves, and suborned as many others to perjure themselves as witnesses, in order to acquire the title." This, it is argued, establishes at least that it is more probable that the grantees were fictitious than that they were real persons, and that, in view of the difficulty, if not the impossibility, of proving the negative proposition that no such persons existed, and of the fact that the defendants connect their title and right with a transaction which must have occurred with these grantees if they had an actual existence, the burden of proof is shifted from the United States to the defendants, and that, as the latter introduced no evidence tending to show the fact as they claimed it to be, the case of the complainants must be considered as established by a preponderance of proof.

We have had recent occasion to consider the question of the character and degree of proof necessary in such cases to invalidate titles held by purchasers in good faith for value and without notice, under patents issued by the United States. In the Maxwell Land Grant Case, 121 U. S. 325, 379 [30:949, 958] it is said: "The deliberate action of the tribunals to which the law commits the determination of all preliminary questions, and the control of the processes by which this evidence of title is issued to the grantee, demands that, to annul such an instrument and destroy the title claimed under it, the facts on which this action is asked for must be clearly established by evidence entirely satisfactory to the court, and that the case itself must be entirely within the class of causes for which such an instrument may be avoided. * * *. We take the general doctrine to be, that when in a court of equity it is proposed to set aside, to annul, or to correct a written instrument for fraud or mistake in the execution of the instrument itself, the testimony on which this is done must be clear, unequivocal, and convincing, and that it cannot be done upon a bare preponderance of evidence which leaves the issue in doubt. If the proposition, as thus laid down in the cases cited, is sound in regard to the ordinary contracts of private individuals, how much more should it be observed where the attempt is to annul the grants, the patents, and other solemn evidence of title emanating from the Government of the United States under its official seal? In this class of cases, the respect due to a patent, the presumptions that all the preceding steps required by the law had been observed before its issue, the immense importance and necessity of the stability of titles dependent upon these official instruments demand that the effort to set them aside, to annul them, or to correct mistakes in them should only be successful when the allegations on which this is attempted are clearly stated and fully sustained by proof. It is not to be admitted that the titles by which so much property in this country and so many rights are held, purporting to emanate from the authoritative action of the officers of the Government, and, as in this case, under the seal and signature of the President of the United States himself, shall be dependent upon the hazard of successful resistance to the whims and caprices of every person who chooses to attack them in a court of justice; but it should be well understood that only that class of evidence which commands respect, and that amount of it which produces conviction, shall make such an attempt successful."

It thus appears that the title of the defendants rests upon the strongest presumptions of fact which, although they may be rebutted, nevertheless can be overthrown only by full proofs to the contrary, clear, convincing, and unambiguous. The burden of producing these proofs and establishing the conclusion to which they are directed rests upon the Government. Neither is it relieved of this obligation by the negative nature of the proposition it is bound to establish. It is, indeed, sometimes said that a negative is incapable of proof, but this is not a maxim of the law. In the language of an eminent text writer: "When the negative ceases to be a simple one—when it is qualified by time, place, or circumstance—much of this objection is removed: and proof of a negative may very reasonably be required when the qualifying circumstances are the direct matter in issue, or the affirmative is either probable in itself, or supported by a presumption, or peculiar means of proof are in the hands of the party asserting the negative." Best, Law of Ev. Am. ed. 1888, § 270. See also Ibid, § 273: "When a presumption is in favor of the party who asserts the negative it only affords an additional reason for casting the burden of proof on his adversary; it is when a presumption is in favor of the party who asserts the affirmative that its effect becomes visible, as the opposite side is then bound to prove his negative." Also Ibid, § 276: "This appears from the case of Doe v. Whitehead, 8 Ad. & E. 571, which was an ejectment by a landlord against a tenant on an alleged forfeiture by breach of a covenant in his lease to insure against fire in some office in or near London, in which it was contended that it lay on the defendant to show that he had insured, that being a fact within his peculiar knowledge. The argument ab inconvenienti was strongly urged, viz.: that the plaintiff could not bring persons from every insurance office in or near London to show that no such insurance had been effected by the defendant; and Rex v. Turner, 5 Maule & S. 206; Apothecaries Co. v. Bently, 1 Car. & P. 538, & Ry. & M. 159, and some other cases of that class, were cited. But Lord Denman, C. J., in delivering judgment, said: 'I do not dispute the cases on the game laws which have been cited; but there the defendant is in the first instance shown to have done an act which was unlawful unless he was qualified, and then the proof of qualification is thrown upon the defendant. Here the plaintiff relies on something done or permitted by the lessee, and takes upon himself the burden of proving that fact. The proof may be difficult where the matter is peculiarly within the defendant's knowledge; but that does not vary the rule of law.' And in the same case Littledale, J., said: 'In the cases cited as to game, the defendant had to bring himself within the protection of the statutes; and a like observation applies to Apothecaries Co. v. Bentley. But here, where a landlord brings an action to defeat the estate granted to the lessee, the onus of proof ought to lie on the plaintiff.' And this ruling has been held by subsequent cases. Toleman v. Portbury, L. R. 5 Q. B. 288; Wedgwood v. Hart, 2 Jur. N. S. 288; Price v. Worwood, 4 Hurl. & N. 512."

Mr. Greenleaf states the rule in equivalent terms. He says (1 Greenl. Ev. § 78): "To this general rule, that the burden of proof is on the party holding the affirmative, there are some exceptions, in which the proposition, though negative in its terms, must be proved by the party who states it. One class of these exceptions will be found to include those cases in which the plaintiff grounds his right of action upon a negative allegation, and where, of course, this negative is an essential element in his case." And in section 80: "So, where the negative allegation involves a charge of criminal neglect of duty, whether official or otherwise; or fraud; or the wrongful violation of actual lawful possession of property—the party making the allegation must prove it; for in these cases the presumption of law, which is always in favor of innocence and quiet possession, is in favor of the party charged."

In the present case the facts shown are, in our opinion, not sufficient to overcome the presumption of innocence on the part of the register and receiver of the land office. It is quite consistent with these facts that real persons, whether under their own or under assumed names, did actually appear before them and make preemption claims. There is no testimony whether tending to establish directly any complicity on their part with the fraud which may have been practiced upon them and not through them. It is certain that there were real persons acting in the matter. The purchase price due on the entry of the lands was in fact paid. There is no proof of any actual fabrication of the papers, the genuineness of which is not negatived by any internal evidence. The allegations in the bill, that they were in fact manufactured by the register and receiver and Hunt, or by anyone with their connivance, are entirely unsupported by direct evidence.

It is alleged in the bill also that "By the rules and regulations which then and since have governed it in the issue of patents for land located with agricultural college scrip, no patent was issued by your orator except on presentation at its General Land-Office, by the person making such location, his agent, or his assign, of the duplicate certificate as aforesaid delivered to the locator for the land for which a patent is claimed," and "that after the forwarding by the said Stanton and Cook of said supposed proofs of preemption, said agricultural college scrip, said money, said non-mineral affidavit, and said duplicate certificate, in each of the said pretended preemption claims as aforesaid mentioned, to your orator's General Land-Office at Washington, the said Alexander C. Hunt, pretending to act as agent of each of said supposed preemptors, presented to the officers of the General Land-Office such other duplicate certificate of location, and requested said officers to cause a patent for each of the said several pieces of land to issue from your orator to the said supposed persons in each case purporting to claim and apply for the same." And it is added that the officers of the General Land-Office, confiding in the honesty of the register and receiver, and believing the statements contained in the proofs to be true, did issue its patents therefor. The allegation is that the patents were issued to Hunt. In point of fact, it appears from the evidence that a number of patents were delivered to Britton & Gray, W. P. Dunwoody, and W. W. Cowling, respectively, through whom the duplicate certificates were presented to the General Land-Office for that purpose. There is no allegation that these were not real persons, nor are any charges made against them as participants in the fraud. They profess to represent the parties entitled to the patents; they must have known for whom in fact they were acting. There is nothing to show that they were not accessible as witnesses. From the correspondence in the record it appears that Britton & Gray were transacting business in the City of Washington, and that Cowling was also a resident of the District of Columbia. None of these parties were called by the Government as witnesses. Whatever may be said as an excuse for the failure to call Hunt and Stanton and Cook, on the ground that they are charged with being the actual conspirators in the fraud, no reason can be assigned for not calling Britton & Gray, Dunwoody and Cowling.

Neither do we think the reason assigned, as an excuse on the part of the Government for not calling the register and receiver as witnesses, is valid or satisfactory. One of them, it was said at the bar, had died. But the other might and ought to have been examined. He was one of its own officers, through whom the Government had received the price of the lands sold, and which it has ever since retained. If his official conduct was impugned, nevertheless his misconduct, if proved, was not imputable to the defendants, and they should not be prejudiced by the odium of an accusation against him. The United States had trusted him, and, inspired by that confidence, the defendants also had relied upon his official acts. In this faith they had paid full value for what they had reason to believe was a perfect title. They were not accused of any complicity with, nor had they any knowledge of, the fraud charged. In the absence of direct proof of his guilt the Government could not properly treat the defendants as his confederates, nor deprive them of any defense which as a witness he might be able to make for himself. The United States had no higher interest at stake than to establish the truth and justice of the transaction. It was due from it to these parties, whose estate this suit was instituted to defeat, to produce and examine as witnesses those who must have had the best knowledge of the facts, so as not to force the defendants to explanations which, by the very theory of their innocence and ignorance, they were incapable of making. To raise a suspicion, however strong, of the fraud and wrong doing of its own officers is not enough to justify the Government in casting upon the defendants the burden of establishing their title.

In addition, warranty deeds, made to Jackson as trustee, were put in evidence by the Government, reciting a consideration in each case, amounting in the aggregate to $52,200, to the payment of which Jackson also testifies. Each of these deeds was executed, acknowledged, and recorded in conformity with law. They were regular on their face, the acknowledgments purporting to have been taken by public officers before whom, it is recited, the grantors severally appeared and acknowledged their execution. These officers, if called and examined as witnesses, would probably have thrown some light upon the transaction, and should have been examined upon the points in issue. It is to be presumed that they could have testified whether any persons in fact appeared before them at the times and places named in their certificates, and whether, if so, they were identified as being the persons named as grantors in the deeds. None of them were in fact called on the part of the United States, and no reason is assigned for not having done so. It thus appears that the Government did not make all the proof of which the nature of the case was susceptible, and which was apparently within its reach.

On the other hand, the defendants by their evidence, have fully established all the steps by which they became connected with the transaction. The lands were bought and paid for at their full value by William S. Jackson, acting for himself and associates, who united together for the purpose of making purchases of land in that region, upon Jackson's belief and assurance of its ultimate value, expecting it to increase by the building of railroads and general growth of the country. He arranged with Hunt, who was engaged in dealing in lands, and had been Governor of the Territory, to pay for titles to such lands as he might accept. Hunt submitted to him descriptions of lands which he said he could control, from which Jackson made selections. For these Hunt sent to Jackson deeds duly executed, attested and acknowledged, accompanied by receiver's certificates in regular form, showing that the party named as grantor was entitled to a patent. These he was advised by counsel to accept, and did accept in good faith, as being equivalent to patents. In many instances the patents were issued before the deeds were executed. Jackson had no connection whatever with making the proofs of preemption, and had no knowledge in reference thereto, except such as was disclosed by the deeds and certificates, in reliance upon which, and without visiting the lands or having them examined, he bought. The deeds to Jackson were duly acknowledged before competent officers by persons certified to be the grantors therein named. The transactions were several, as regards the various tracts of land, and successive, during more than two years, the deeds being delivered within a period extending from May 2, 1873, to May 21, 1875. The circumstance that many of the acknowledgments of the deeds were taken in Arapahoe County before a notary in Hunt's office, while the grantors purported to be residents of Las Animas County, was not calculated to raise any suspicion of fraud, as Jackson supposed that Hunt was dealing with the preemptors, and was procuring their deeds to be executed for delivery to him, and it was natural to expect that this would be done at Hunt's own office. In fact, fourteen of the acknowledgments were taken before other officers, and some of them in Las Animas County. That Jackson and his assigns, the Coal and Town Company, and its successor, the Coal and Iron Company, in good faith believed that they had acquired a valid title to these lands, is manifest from their subsequent dealing with them. They not only paid full value for the lands in the condition in which they were, but they made large investments thereon in the way of improvements. At the time of the organization of the consolidated Company there were upon the premises described in the bill coke ovens and machinery in connection therewith, buildings constituting the Town of El Moro, and coal mine improvements, consisting of entries, rooms, gangways, tracks, chutes, repair shops, houses, and store buildings. Coal was then, between six and seven years after Jackson's purchase, being mined upon one quarter section, and the Town of El Moro covered thirty or forty acres, comprising twenty to twenty-five buildings, erected by various individuals, to whom the Company had sold lots, in accordance with a regular survey and map of the town site. The entire value of the mine and coke improvements was estimated to be about $250,000. The property was used by the Company in connection with works which they had established at South Pueblo for the manufacture of iron and steel, on which there had been an expenditure of from one to two millions of dollars, the coal and coke necessary for carrying on which was obtained from the coal mines on part of the premises in dispute. As against interests of this magnitude and value rested upon a claim of title, the good faith of which on the part of the defendants is absolutely unimpeached, the proof of a fraud which renders their title absolutely void should be stronger than the legal presumptions on which it may rightfully rest.

It is urged in argument by the Solicitor-General that this case cannot be distinguished from that of Moffat v. U. S. 112 U. S. 24 [28: 623]. The two cases are undoubtedly similar in their general aspects, but, nevertheless, differ in some particulars most material to the decision. It is stated in the report of the case cited that "The testimony taken fully established the truth of the allegations and charges, except as to the knowledge by Moffat and Carr of the alleged frauds." The charges proven, or to be taken as proven, therefore, as set forth in the bill, were, that the title papers in the case were manufactured by a clerk in the office of the receiver, and that the receiver was also the owner of the agricultural college scrip used to pay for the lands located, and that, for the purpose of locating the land with it in the name of Quinlan, the register and receiver had inserted in a blank indorsement his fictitious name and and residence, and in that name had located the scrip on the land, there being no such person, nor any settlement and improvement on the land; and that the duplicate certificate on which the patent issued was presented to the General Land-Office by the defendant himself, who was thus brought into direct connection with the officers who had committed the fraud, and with the transaction before the issue of the patent. In that case Moffat did not offer his deed in evidence, was not examined as a witness, and attempted no proof either of his own innocence or of the payment of value, but stood without explanation as to who his immediate grantors were, or how he came in contact with them. The receiver was examined as a witness, but wholly failed to meet the charges alleged against him. There was further proof tending to show that the acknowledgments of the deeds to Moffat had been taken without identification of the grantors from whom Moffat received his deeds directly, and in respect to whom he must have had some knowledge. These circumstances, in our opinion, clearly distinguish that case from the present one.

There is, however, another ground on which it is contended by the Government that the patents described in the bill are void. It is alleged that the lands in controversy were not subject to settlement and sale under the pre emption laws, being "known mines" within the description of those laws. The Act of Sept. 4, 1841, 5 Stat. at L., 455, chap. 16, § 10, provided that no preemption entry should be made on "lands on which are situated any known salines or mines." By the Act of July 1, 1864, 13 Stat. at L., 343, chap. 205, section 1, it is enacted "That where any tracts embracing coal beds or coal fields constituting portions of the public domain, and which as 'mines' are excluded from the Preemption Act of 1841, and which under past legislation are not liable to ordinary private entry, it shall and may be lawful for the President to cause such tracts, in suitable legal subdivisions, to be offered at public sale to the highest bidder, after public notice of not less than three months, at a minimum price of twenty dollars per acre; and any lands not thus disposed of shall thereafter be liable to private entry at said minimum."

The language of the Preemption Act of 1841 is preserved in section 2258 of the Revised Statutes. The Act of 1864 and its supplemental Act of March 3, 1865, 13 Stat. at L., 529, chap. 107, were substantially re-enacted by the Act of March 3, 1873, 17 Stat. at L., 607, chap. 279, now embodied in section 2347 of the Revised Statutes, and the sections immediately following. The force and meaning of the original legislation remains unchanged. The subsequent provisions relate to the classification and terms and mode of entry and sale of the coal lands excluded from preemption by the laws on that subject. In reference to coal lands which are noted on public surveys and plats as such, of course it is not to be disputed that their character is thereby made known so as to withdraw them from entry under the Preemption and Homestead Acts. Where this is not done it remains, as in the present case, to determine how the character of the lands is to be ascertained, so that they may be classified as those "on which are situated any known salines or mines."

It is argued by the Solicitor-General, upon the facts as disclosed by the evidence in this record, that the lands covered by these patents embraced "known mines" of coal, and that, as such lands were expressly excepted out of the preemption laws, the patents issued therefor were void for want of power on the part of the officer to issue them, as decided in Polk v. Wendal, 13 U. S. 9 Cranch, 87 [3: 665]; Minter v. Crommelin, 59 U. S. 18 How. 87 [15: 279]; Reichart v. Felps, 73 U. S. 6 Wall. 160 [18: 849]; Morton v. Nebraska, 88 U. S. 21 Wall. 660 [22: 639]. In the last named case, Morton v. Nebraska, it was said, page 674 [645]: "The salines in this case were not hidden as mines often are, but were so incrusted with salt that they resembled 'snow-covered lakes,' and were consequently not subject to preemption." In McLaughlin v. U. S. 107 U. S. 526 [27: 621] the decree of the circuit court canceling the patent, on the ground that it purported to convey lands as part of a railroad grant, which were excepted therefrom as mineral lands, was affirmed. The court says, page 528 [621]: "It is satisfactorily proven, as we think, that cinnabar, the mineral which carries quicksilver, was found there as early as 1863; that a man named Powell resided on the land and mined this cinnabar at that time, and in 1866 established some form of reduction works there; that these were on the ground when application for the patent was made by the defendant McLaughlin, as agent of the Western Pacific Railroad Company, and that these facts were known to him. He is not, therefore, an innocent purchaser." See Western Pacific R. R. Co. v. U. S. 108 U. S. 510 [27: 806].

In the case of Mullan v. U. S. 118 U. S. 271 [30: 170] after referring to the Acts of Congress above recited, the court, speaking of the Act of July 1, 1864, says, page 277 [172]: "This is clearly a legislative declaration that 'known' coal lands were mineral lands within the meaning of that term as used in statutes regulating the public lands, unless a contrary intention of Congress was clearly manifested. Whatever doubt there may be as to the effect of this declaration on past transactions, it is clear that after it was made coal lands were to be treated as mineral lands. That the land now in dispute was 'known' coal land at the time it was selected, no one can doubt. It had been worked as a mine for many years before, and it had upon its surface all the appliances necessary for reaching, taking out, and delivering the coal. That Barnard knew what it was when he asked for its location for his use is absolutely certain, because he was one of the agents of the coal company at the time, and undoubtedly acted in its behalf in all that he did. If Mullan and Avery were ignorant of the fact when they acquired their respective interests in the property, it was because they willfully shut their eyes to what was going on around them, and purposely kept themselves in ignorance of notorious facts. But the evidence satisfies us entirely that they were not ignorant."

It will thus be seen that, so far as the decisions of this court have heretofore gone, no lands have been held to be "known mines" unless at the time the rights of the purchaser accrued there was upon the ground an actual and opened mine which had been worked or was capable of being worked.

In the case of Deffeback v. Hawke, 115 U. S. 392 [29: 428], the legislation on the subject was reviewed at length. It was there held that no title from the United States to land known at the time of sale to be valuable for its minerals of gold, silver, cinnabar, or copper can be obtained under the preemption or homestead laws, or the town-site laws, or in any other way than as prescribed by the laws specially authorizing the sale of such land, except in the States of Michigan, Wisconsin, Minnesota, Missouri, and Kansas. The court says, page 404 [426]: "We say 'land known at the time to be valuable for its minerals,' as there are vast tracts of public land in which minerals of different kinds are found, but not in such quantity as to justify expenditures in the effort to extract them. It is not to such lands that the term 'mineral' in the sense of the statute is applicable. * * * We also say lands known at the time of their sale to be thus valuable, in order to avoid any possible conclusion against the validity of titles which may be issued for other kinds of land in which years afterwards rich deposits of mineral may be discovered. It is quite possible that lands settled upon as suitable only for agricultural purposes, entered by the settler, and patented by the Government, under the preemption laws, may be found years after the patent has been issued to contain valuable minerals. Indeed, this has often happened. We therefore use the term known to be valuable at the time of sale to prevent any doubt being cast upon titles to lands afterwards found to be different in their mineral character from what was supposed when the entry of them was made and the patent issued."

It is not sufficient, in our opinion, to constitute "known mines" of coal, within the meaning of the statute, that there should merely be indications of coal beds or coal fields of greater or less extent and of greater or less value, as shown by outcroppings. The Act of 1864 evidently contemplates a distinction between coal beds or coal fields excluded from the preemption Act of 1841 as "known mines," and other coal beds or coal fields not coming within that description. We hold, therefore, that to constitute the exemption contemplated by the Preemption Act under the head of "known mines," there should be upon the land ascertained coal deposits of such an extent and value as to make the land more valuable to be worked as a coal mine, under the conditions existing at the time, than for merely agricultural purposes. The circumstance that there are surface indications of the existence of veins of coal does not constitute a mine. It does not even prove that the land will ever be under any conditions sufficiently valuable on account of its coal deposits to be worked as a mine. A change in the conditions occurring subsequently to the sale, whereby new discoveries are made, or by means whereof it may become profitable to work the veins as mines, cannot affect the title as it passed at the time of the sale. The question must be determined according to the facts in existence at the time of the sale. If upon the premises at that time there were not actual "known mines" capable of being profitably worked for their product, so as to make the land more valuable for mining than for agriculture, a title to them acquired under the Preemption Act cannot be successfully assailed, In the present case, the testimony, in our opinion, does not justify us in finding that at the time Jackson acquired his title there were upon any part of the premises in controversy any "known mines" of coal, in the sense of the statute.

For these reasons the decree of the Circuit Court is reversed and the cause remanded, with a direction to dismiss the bill; and it is so ordered.

JOHN KNIGHT ET AL.

Certificate of division—how points certified—case, when dismissed—statement of facts—mixed question—lawful preference.

1. Under the statutes authorizing questions upon which two judges of the circuit are divided in opinion to be certified to this court, the points certified must be questions of law only, and not questions of fact, or of mixed law and fact.

2. The whole case, even when its decision turns upon matter of law only, cannot be sent up by certificate of division. Nor can a splitting up of the whole case into the form of several questions enable the court to take jurisdiction.

3. Whenever the jurisdiction of this court depends upon a certificate of division of opinion, and the questions certified are not such as this court is authorized to answer, the case must be dismissed.

4. The statement of facts should be one of ultimate facts, leaving nothing but a conclusion of law to be drawn; not a statement of particular facts, in the nature of matters of evidence, upon which no decision can be made without inferring a fact which is not found.

5. Whether a sale of goods was fraudulent as against the plaintiffs is not a pure question of law, but a question either of fact, or of mixed law and fact.

6. In the absence of any bankrupt or insolvent law, a debtor may lawfully give a preference to one of his creditors if he does not thereby intend to defraud the others; and a sale and delivery of goods in satisfaction of an honest debt cannot be avoided by other creditors, unless made and received with intent in fact to defraud them. The fact that one of the creditors preferred was the debtor's wife does not affect the question.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Indiana. Dismissed.

The facts are stated by the court.

Messrs. Benjamin Harrison and Horace Speed, for appellants:

The cognovit itself was an impending lien upon John Knight's property—the store merchandise.

Buckingham v. McLean, 54 U. S. 13 How. 150 (14: 90).

A man who buys goods on credit, not intending to pay for them, commits a fraud. The phrase "intends to pay" means that he honestly believes and expects that he will pay for them. It does not include a mere speculative possibility of payment, nor speculative experiments at the risk of the persons who sell on credit.

Johnson v. Monell, 2 Keyes, 663, 664; Hilliard v. Cagle, 46 Miss. 339; Talcott v. Henderson, 31 Ohio St. 162; Davis v. Stewart, 8 Fed. Rep. 804.

And if the purchaser has been for a long time trading with old customers, and so establishing a proper confidence, he must, if there is a sudden, serious, unfavorable change in his affairs, known only to himself, inform them of that change.

Brown v. Montgomery, 20 N. Y. 287; Mitchell v. Worden, 20 Barb. 253; Pike v. Wieting, 49 Barb. 315; Stewart v. Emerson, 52 N. H. 316; Chaffee v. Fort, 2 Lans. 86; Johnson v. Monell, 2 Keyes, 655; Kerr, Fraud & M. 109; Bank of Republic v. Baxter, 31 Vt. 111; Bufe v. Turner, 6 Taunt. 338; Irving v. Motly, 7 Bing. 543; Conyers v. Ennis, 2 Mason, 239, 240; Hilliard v. Cagle, 46 Miss. 337.

The fraud on Knight's part was gross.

Devoe v. Brandt, 53 N. Y. 462; Durell v. Haley, 1 Paige, 492; Buckingham v. McLean, 54 U. S. 13 How. 150, 166, 167 (14:90, 97); Re Pitts, 8 Fed. Rep. 264.

It is not necessary both that John Knight should have had a fraudulent intent, and that his codefendants should have had knowledge of that fact. It would be amply sufficient if they had notice.

Distilled Spirits, 78 U. S. 11 Wall. 366 (20: 171); Hilliard v. Cagle, 46 Miss. 309.

A sale under the execution by the sheriff would have been fraudulent.

Bunn v. Ahl, 29 Pa. 387; D'Ivernois v. Leavitt, 23 Barb. 63; Mackie v. Cairns, 5 Cow. 571, 579.

This series of actions belongs to that class which the court would not permit, because they are injurious to the community and therefore contrary to public policy.

Such stipulations tend inevitably to give a fraudulent advantage to the debtor over his other creditors.

The policy of the law makes the acts illegal. McKibbin v. Martin, 64 Pa. 352.

It has already been decided in Kehr v. Smith, 87 U. S. 20 Wall. 36 (22: 315), that where a deed is set aside for fraud as to existing creditors, it is set aside as to both prior and subsequent creditors. And conversely, the cases there cited, particularly.

Maganley's Trust, 5 De Gex. & S. 1; Jenkyn v. Vaughan, 3 Drew. 424.

A cognovit cannot be taken and held while an insolvent merchant makes many purchases and afterwards makes one effort to get free, and when that effort fails the cognovit is entered, and a levy thereunder is made upon all his property including that he had bought on credit while the cognovit was so held, without the cognovit being subject to the same objection made to the trust deed, held for the same purpose.

Messrs. Joseph E. McDonald, John M. Butler and Ferdinand Winter, for appellees:

The questions which may be considered by the court upon a certificate of division of opinion must be:

1. Questions material to, and which have actually arisen upon the facts of the case, and not mere abstract questions.

2. Questions of law only, and not questions of fact, or of mixed law and fact for the determination of which it is necessary to examine the facts of the case.

3. Questions presenting but a single point, and not, separately or altogether, involving a decision of the whole case.

State Nat. Bank v. St. Louis R. F. Co. 122 U. S. 21 (30: 1121); Williamsport Nat. Bank v. Knapp, 119 U. S. 357 (30: 446); Waterville v. Van Slyke 116 U. S. 699 (29: 772); California etc., Paving Co. v. Molitor, 113 U. S. 609 (28: 1106); Weeth v. New England Mortgage S. Co. 106 U. S. 605 (27: 99); Brobst v. Brobst, 71 U. The Statute of Indiana makes the question of whether a transfer of property is voidable by creditors on account of fraud, in all cases, a question of fact.

And this is the settled rule as decided in many cases.

Sherman v. Hogland, 54 Ind. 578; Leasure v. Coburn, 57 Ind. 274; Parton v. Yates, 41 Ind. 456; Kane v. Drake, 27 Ind. 29; Luce v. Shoff, 70 Ind. 152; Sedgwick v. Tucker, 90 Ind. 271; Willis v. Thompson, 93 Ind. 62; Medsker v. Bonebrake, 108 U. S. 20 How. 448 (15: 950.)

The question of fraud being one of fact, none of the questions certified can properly be considered by the court.

The questions present the whole case for decision.

Wilson v. Barnum, 49 U. S. 8 How. 258 (12: 1070); U. S. v. Bailey, 34 U. S. 9 Pet. 265 (9: 123.)

The same end is sought to be attained here by separating the whole case into several questions. This cannot be done.

White v. Turk, 37 U. S. 12 Pet. 238 (9: 1069); Nesmith v. Sheldon, 47 U. S. 6 How. 41 (12: 335); Webster v. Cooper, 51 U. S. 10 How. 54 (13: 325); Dennistoun v. Stewart, supra.

A cognovit, until it is put in judgment, is not a lien upon any property of the debtor.

R. S. 1881, §§ 608, 686; Buckingham v. McLean, 54 U. S. 13 How. 150 (14: 90); Blennerhassett v. Sherman, 105 U. S. 100 (26: 1080); Hilliard v. Cagle, 46 Mass. 309; Bunn v. Ahl, 29 Pa. 387; Devoe v. Brandt, 53 N. Y. 462.

At common law cognovits might be held for a considerable time.

Manufacturers & M. Bank v. St. John, 5 Hill, 497.

The cognovit itself was not vitiated by this delay; but, even if it had been, the subsequent transaction, entirely disconnected, and the bona fide of which is not questioned, would not be affected.

Stewart v. Dunham, 115 U. S. 61 (29: 329); Harvey v. Mix, 24 Conn. 406; Matthews v. Buck, 48 Me. 265; Oriental Bank v. Haskins, 3 Met. 332; Bump, Fr. Conv. 467, 483.

Even where there is a fraudulent intent on the part of the vendor, the vendee for value will not be affected unless he has knowledge of such fraudulent intent.

Medsker v. Bonebrake, Jones v. Simpson, Prewit v. Wilson, and Magniac v. Thompson, supra; Lipperd v. Edwards, 39 Ind. 165; Bunnel v. Witherow, 29 Ind. 123.

Mr. Justice Gray delivered the opinion of the court:

The claim of each plaintiff being for less than $5,000, the amount in dispute, as was admitted at the bar, is insufficient of itself to give this court jurisdiction. Stewart v. Dunham, 115 U. S. 61 [29:329]; Gibson v. Shufeldt, 122 U. S. 27 [30:1083].

The jurisdiction of this case therefore depends upon the statutes which provide that when, on the trial or hearing of any civil suit or proceeding before the circuit court held by the circuit judge and the district judge, or by either of them and a justice of this court, any question occurs upon which the opinions of the judges are opposed, the opinion of the presiding judge shall prevail and be considered as the opinion of the court for the time being; "The point upon which they so disagreed shall, during the same term, be stated under the direction of the judges, and certified, and such certificate shall be entered of record;" and the final judgment or decree "may be reviewed, and affirmed or reversed or modified, by the supreme court, on writ of error or appeal." R. S. §§ 650, 652, 693.

Under these statutes, and the earlier ones authorizing questions upon which two judges of the circuit court were divided in opinion to be certified to this court, it has been established by repeated decisions that each question so certified must be a distinct point or proposition of law, clearly stated, so that it can be definitely answered, without regard to other issues of law or of fact in the case.

The points certified must be questions of law only, and not questions of fact, or of mixed law and fact—"not such as involve or imply conclusions or judgment by the court upon the weight or effect of testimony or facts adduced in the cause." Dennistoun v. Stewart, 59 U. S. 18 How. 565, 568 [15: 489, 490]; Wilson v. Barnum, 49 U. S. 8 How. 258 [12:1070]; Silliman v. Hudson River Bridge Co. 66 U. S. 1 Black, 562 [17:81] Daniels v. Chicago & R. I. R. R. Co. 70 U. S. 3 Wall. 250 [18:224]; Brobst v. Brobst, 71 U. S. 4 Wall. 2 [18:387]; Weeth v. New England Mortgage S. Co. 106 U. S. 605 [27: 99]; California, etc., Paving Co. v. Molitor, 113 U. S. 609 [28:1106]; Waterville v. Van Slyke, 116 U. S. 699 [29:772]; Williamsport Nat. Bank v. Knapp, 119 U. S. 357 [30:446]. The question of fraud or no fraud is one necessarily compounded of fact and of law, and the fact must be distinctly found before this court can decide the law upon a certificate of division of opinion. Ogilvie v. Knox Ins. Co. 59 U. S. 18 How. 577, 581 [15:490, 492]; U. S. v. City Bank, 60 U. S. 19 How. 385 [15:662]; Havemeyer v. Iowa County, 70 U. S. 3 Wall. 294 [18:38]; Watson v. Taylor, 88 U. S. 21 Wall. 378 [22:576].

The whole case, even when its decision turns upon matters of law only cannot be sent up by certificate of division. Saunders v. Gould, 29 U. S. 4 Pet. 392 [7:897]; U. S. v. Bailey, 34 U. S. 9 Pet. 267 [9:124]; Harris v. Elliott, 35 U. S. 10 Pet. 25 [9:333]; White v. Turk, 37 U. S. 12 Pet. 238 [9:1069]; U. S. v. Briggs, 46 U. S. 5 How. 208 [12:119]; Sadler v. Hoover, 48 U. S. 7 How. 646 [12:855]; U. S. v. Northway; 120 U. S. 327 [30:664]; State Bank v. St. Louis R. F. Co. 122 U. S. 21 [30:1121]. Nor can a splitting up of the whole case and of the form of several questions enable the court to take jurisdiction. White v. Turk, above cited; Nesmith v. Sheldon, 47 U. S. 6 How. 41 [12:335]; Luther v. Borden, 48 U. S. 7 How. 1, 47 [12:581,601]; Webster v. Cooper, 51 U. S. 10 How. 54 [13:325].

In Webster v. Cooper, decided at December Term, 1850, it appearing by the record that the whole case had been divided into points and sent up to this court, and that several of the latter points could not have arisen until the previous ones had been first decided, this court declined to take jurisdiction, and Chief Justice Taney said: "This court has frequently said that this practice is irregular, and would, if sanctioned, convert this court into one of original jurisdiction in questions of law, instead of being, as the Constitution intented it to be, an appellate court to revise the decisions of inferior tribunals. Indeed, it would impose upon it the duty of deciding in the first instance, not only the questions of law which properly belonged to the case, but also questions merely hypothetical and speculative, which might or might not arise as previous questions were ruled the one way or the other." P. 55 [325].

As the Chief Justice there observed, in some earlier instances, questions irregularly certified had been acted upon and decided. But the later decisions already referred to show that this court has since been careful not to exceed its lawful jurisdiction in this class of cases; and that under the existing statutes, as under those which preceded them, whenever the jurisdiction of this court depends upon a certificate of division of opinion, and the questions certified are not such as this court is authorized to answer, the case must be dismissed.

In the present case, general creditors of Knight seek to set aside, as fraudulent against them, a warrant of attorney to confess judgment, executed by Knight to secure the payment of money lent to him in good faith by his wife and his bankers, and a subsequent sale of his stock of goods to satisfy those debts.

The statement (embodied in the certificate and occupying three closely printed pages in the record) of what the judges below call "the facts found" is in truth a narrative in detail of various circumstances as to the debtor's pecuniary condition, his dealings with the parties to this suit and with other persons, and the extent of the preferred creditors' knowledge of his condition and dealings. It is not a statement of ultimate facts, leaving nothing but a conclusion of law to be drawn; but it is a statement of particular facts, in the nature of matters of evidence, upon which no decision can be made without inferring a fact which is not found.

The main issue in the case, upon which its decision must turn, and which the certificate attempts in various forms to refer to the determination of this court, is whether the sale of goods was fraudulent as against the plaintiffs. That is not a pure question of law, but a question either of fact or of mixed law and fact.

In the absence of any bankrupt or insolvent law, a debtor may lawfully give a preference to one of his creditors, if he does not thereby intend to defraud the others; and a sale and delivery of goods in satisfaction of an honest debt cannot be avoided by other creditors, unless made and received with intent in fact to defraud them. This is well settled by the decisions of this court, as well as by those of the highest court of the State of Indiana, where these transactions took place. Buckingham v. McLean, 54 U. S. 13 How. 151, 167]14:91, 97]; Warner v. Norton, 61 U. S. 20 How. 448 [15:950]; Robinson v. Elliott, 89 U. S. 22 Wall. 513, 520 [22:758, 761]; Medsker v. Bonebrake, 108 U. S. 66 [27:654]; Stewart v. Dunham, 115 U. S. 61 [29:329]; Jones v. Simpson, 116 U. S. 609 [29:742]; People's Savings Bank v. Bates, 120 U. S. 556 [30:754]; Huiskamp v. Moline Wagon Co. 121 U. S. 310, 319 [30:971, 974]; Pence v. Croan, 51 Ind. 336; Leasure v. Coburn, 57 Ind. 274; Willis v. Thompson, 93 Ind. 62. The fact that one of the creditors preferred was the debtor's wife does not affect the question. Magniac v. Thompson, 32 U. S. 7 Pet. 348 [8:709]; Bean v. Patterson, 122 U. S. 496 [30:1126].

Many of the cases cited in the learned arguments at the bar were of voluntary conveyances, or arose under a Bankrupt Act, or presented the question whether there was sufficient evidence of fraudulent intent to be submitted to a jury, or were decided by a court authorized to pass upon the facts as well as the law, and therefore have no direct or important bearing upon this case.

Not one of the questions certified presents a distinct point of law; and each of them, either in express terms or by necessary implication, involves in its decision a consideration of all the circumstances of the case. The first question, whether the six weeks' delay in taking judgment upon the warrant of attorney made the subsequent sale voidable by the plaintiffs, as well as the second question, whether evidence of the debtor's fraudulent intent and of the preferred creditors' knowledge of that intent was requisite to render "said sale" void as against the plaintiffs, could not be determined except upon a view of all the attendant circumstances. The third question, whether "such sale," if fraudulent, would be voidable in favor of the whole or of part only of the plaintiff's debts, could not arise until the sale had been decided to be fraudulent. The fourth and fifth questions frankly submit in two subdivisions the general question, whether "under the circumstances" the sale was fraudulent as against the plaintiffs.

As was recently said by this court, speaking of questions certified in similar form: "They are mixed propositions of law and fact, in regard to which the court cannot know precisely where the division of opinion arose on a question of law alone;" and "It is very clear that the whole case has been sent here for us to decide, with the aid of a few suggestions from the circuit judges of the difficulties they have found in doing so." Waterville v. Van Slyke, 116 U. S. 699, 704 [29:772, 774].

Upon this record, therefore, this court cannot decide, either that the decree of the Circuit Court should be affirmed, or that it should be reversed or modified, but must order the appeal to be dismissed.

Federal question—town tax law—state judgments, when reviewable—prior decision—estoppel—upon whom binding.

1. Whether lands sold by the United States are taxable within a year after the title passed out of the United States, is not a federal question.

2. There was nothing in the Act of Congress admitting Iowa into the Union as a State, which in any manner interfered with the power of the State to tax lands as soon as they ceased to be the property of the United States. The only prohibition was against taxation whilst the United States was the owner.

3. A judgment of a state court which relates only to the construction of a state statute, which is in no way in conflict with the Constitution or any law of the United States, is final, and not reviewable here.

4. The decision in the case of Homestead Company v. Valley R. R. is not a judgment in a suit between the same parties, upon the same cause of action, as here involved, and is not a bar to the recovery in these cases; and the state court did not fail to give full faith and credit to that decision, by deciding that it was not such a bar.

5. The judgment of this court in the case of Wolcott v. Des Moines Co. is not an estoppel upon the parties in this suit, although it may be referred to by them as a precedent; its effect as an estoppel was confined to the title of the parties in that suit to the land then in controversy.

6. A brief filed at a hearing in this court, by one interested in the question to be decided, does not make him a party to the suit, or bind him, or estop him, by the decree.

Argued Nov. 1, 1887. Decided Dec. 5, 1887.

IN ERROR to the Supreme Court of the State of Iowa. Affirmed.

The facts and case are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. C. H. Gatch and William Connor, for plaintiffs in error:

Was the question, whether or not the lands upon which the taxes in question were levied were subject to taxation for the year 1861, a federal question? And, if so, was it erroneously decided?

McGregor & M. R. R. Co. v. Brown, 39 Iowa, 655; Iowa Falls & S. C. R. R. Co. v. Cherokee County, 37 Iowa, 483; Goodrich v. Beaman, Id. 563; Iowa Falls & S. C. R. Co. v. Woodbury County, 38 Iowa, 498; Stryker v. Polk County, 22 Iowa, 131; Litchfield v. Hamilton County, 40 Iowa, 66; Litchfield v. Webster County, 101 U. S. 773 (25:925).

Was the question whether or not defendant in error was estopped by the judgment of the court in the case of Iowa Homestead Co. v. Des Moines Valley R. R. Co. 84 U. S. 17 Wall. 153 (21:622) a federal question; and, if so, was it erroneously decided?

Goodnow v. Litchfield, 59 Iowa, 226; Tarleton v. Johnson, 25 Ala. 300; S. C. 60 Am. Dec. 515; Freem. Judg. §§ 174, 175; Robbins v. Chicago, 71 U. S. 4 Wall. 657 (18:427); Conger v. Chilcote, 42 Iowa, 18; Barney v. Dewey, 13 Johns. 224; Stoddard v. Thompson, 31 Iowa, 80; Mackay v. Dillon, 45 U. S. 4 How. 421 (11:1038); Kennedy v. Hunt, 48 U. S. 7 How. 586 (12:892.)

Mr. George Crane, for defendant in error:

It is a well settled rule in jurisprudence that the jurisdiction of any court exercising authority over a subject may be inquired into in every other court when the proceedings in the former are relied upon and brought before the latter by a party claiming the benefit of such proceedings.

Williamson v. Berry, 49 U. S. 8 How. 540 (12:1189) Elliott v. Peirsol, 26 U. S. 1 Pet. 340 (7:170); Rose v. Himely, 8 U. S. 4 Cranch, 241 (2:608); Hickey v. Stewart, 44 U. S. 3 How. 762 (11:819); Bloom v. Burdick, 1 Hill, 130.

The Homestead Company had a perfect right to join the navigation company and all its grantees as defendants in that suit.

Story, Eq. Pl. §§ 72, 78; Elmendorf v. Taylor, 23 U. S. 10 Wheat. 152 (6:289).

It was clearly competent for the Homestead Company to test the title to all the lands mentioned in its petition in a single suit, and to such a suit that company and all its grantees were absolutely necessary and indispensable parties.

Piric v. Tvedt, 115 U. S. 41 (29:331); Starin v. New York, 115 U. S. 248 (29:388); Crump v. Thurber, 115 U. S. 56 (29:328); Ayers v. Wiswall, 112 U. S. 187 (28: 693).

If an indispensable party is a citizen of the same State with the plaintiff, the jurisdiction will be defeated because the controversy will not be between citizens of different States, and thus not within the judicial power of the United States as defined by the Constitution.

Ober v. Gallagher, 93 U. S. 201 (23:829); Ayers v. Chicago, 101 U. S. 184 (25:838).

Was it competent for the parties to confer jurisdiction by consent, acquiescence or agreement? This question has been repeatedly answered by this court in the negative.

Mansfield C. & L. M. R. Co. v. Swan, 111 U. S. 385 (28:464); Capron v. VanNoorden, 6 U. S. 2 Cranch, 126 (2:229); Jackson v. Ashton, 33 U. S. 8 Pet. 148 (8:898).

It was competent for the state court to disregard or annul a judgment of the Federal Court in a collateral proceeding.

Freem. Judg. § 120; Elliott v. Peirsol, and Williamson v. Berry, supra.

The jurisdiction in any court exercising authority over a subject may be inquired into in every other court.

Latham v. Edgerton, 9 Cow. 227; Hickey v. Stewart, supra; Thompson v. Whitman, 85 U. S. 18 Wall. 466 (21:900); Harris v. Hardeman, 55 U. S. 14 How. 334 (14:444).

When the record shows that there was no jurisdiction either over the parties or the subject matter, any judgment rendered by the court is absolutely void, and may be so declared in any collateral proceeding.

Galpin v. Page, 85 U. S. 18 Wall. 366 (21:962); Harris v. Hardeman, 55 U. S. 14 How. 342 (14:447); New York L. Ins. Co. v. Bangs, 103 U. The Homestead suit was brought to restrain the prosecution of a large number of actions at law, and to establish in a single proceeding the plaintiff's title to the lands in controversy and as to this part of the case the suit was strictly a proceeding in equity.

The bill in the Homestead suit was dismissed, and no ground stated upon which the dismissal was made. The clear presumption of law is, that as to the legal issues it was dismissed by the court for want of jurisdiction.

To render the judgment conclusive, it must appear by record of the prior suit that the particular matter sought to be concluded was necessarily tried and determined.

To give this court jurisdiction, it must appear affirmatively on the face of the record that the state court decided, either actually or by necessary intendment, that the lands were taxable prior to the second of March, 1861.

The lands were assessed for taxation in 1876; properly, if they were subject to taxation at any time before the fourth Monday in June of that year, otherwise not.

As the judgment of the state court is sustainable on the ground that the lands were taxable after March 2, 1861, under the laws of Iowa, a ruling that they were taxable prior to that date would not in this case authorize this court to reverse the case.

These suits all grew out of the delay which attended the settlement of the controversies in reference to the Des Moines River improvement land grant made by Congress to the Territory of Iowa, August 8, 1846, which will be hereafter referred to as the river grant. 9 Stat. at L. 77. The character of those controversies may be seen by referring to the cases of Dubuque & P. R. R. Co. v. Litchfield, 64 U. S. 23 How. 66 [16: 500]; Wolcott v. Des Moines Nav. & R. R. Co. 72 U. S. 5 Wall. 681 [18: 689]; Williams v. Baker, 84 U. S. 17 Wall. 144 [21: 561]; Iowa Homestead Co. v. Des Moines Valley R. R. Co. Id. 153 [21: 622]; Wolsey v. Chapman, 101 U. S. 755 [27: 915]. At first it was supposed, both by the officers of the United States and of the State, that the grant embraced lands above the Raccoon Fork of the river; and the State of Iowa made conveyances to the Des Moines Navigation and Railroad Company, under which John Stryker.

Richard B. Chapman, Grace H. Litchfield, Edwin C. Litchfield, J. B. Plumb, and William B. Welles each claimed title to a separate tract in that locality as bona fide purchasers.

On the 15th of May, 1856, Congress made another grant of lands to the State to aid in the construction of railroads. 11 Stat. at L. 9, chap. 28. This grant conflicted with the river grant if the last named grant extended above the Raccoon Fork. The title of the State under the railroad grant to some of the lands above the Fork, was transferred to the Dubuque and Pacific Railroad Company; and that company, on the 25th of October, 1859, began a suit in ejectment against Edwin C. Litchfield to recover possession of one of the tracts. In that suit it was decided by this court April 9, 1860, that the river grant did not extend above the Fork. Dubuque & P. R. R. Co. v. Litchfield, ubi supra. Thereupon Congress, on the second of March, 1861, passed a Joint Resolution relinquishing the interest of the United States in the lands above the Fork to the State for the benefit of bona fide purchasers under the river grant.

The Des Moines Navigation and Railroad Company, holding title from the State to the lands above the Fork under the river grant, conveyed one of the tracts, on the 8th of August, 1859, to Samuel G. Wolcott, by deed, with full covenants of warranty. In 1865 Wolcott brought suit against the Navigation and Railroad Company in the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York to recover damages for a breach of the covenants in that deed, alleging that the title had failed. In that case it was decided by this court, May 13, 1867, that the railroad grant in 1856 did not include any of the lands above the Raccoon Fork which had been claimed under the river grant, and that the title of Wolcott under his deed from the Navigation and Railroad Company had not failed. Wolcott v. Des Moines Nav. & R. R. Co. ubi supra. While that case was pending in this court, the attorney of the Dubuque and Pacific Railroad Company was allowed to file a brief in support of the claim of Wolcott that the title was in that company and not in the Navigation Company.

The title which the Dubuque and Pacific Railroad Company claimed from the State under the railroad grant passed to the Dubuque and Sioux City Railroad Company in the month of August, 1861, and that company afterwards paid the taxes assessed and levied on the lands in dispute for the years 1861, 1862, and 1863. Those for the year 1861 were paid October 31, 1866; those for 1862, December 9, 1863; and those for 1863, January 20, 1864. On the 12th of November, 1863, the railroad company conveyed to the Iowa Homestead Company, an Iowa corporation, its title to the hands in dispute between the railroad company and the claimants under the river grant. The Homestead Company afterwards paid the taxes on the lands for the years 1864, 1865, 1866, 1867, 1868, 1869, 1870, and 1871.

On the 12th of October, 1869, the Homestead Company began a suit in equity in the District Court of Webster County, Iowa, to quiet its title to the lands, making the Des Moines Navigation and Railroad Company, Samuel G. Wolcott, William B. Welles, Roswell S. Burrows, Edwin C. Litchfield, William J. McAlpine, Richard B. Chapman, Albert H. Tracy, Francis W. Tracy, Harriet Tracy, Electus B. Litchfield, Edward Wade, John Stryker, the Des Moines Valley Railroad Company, Thomas Colter, Jacob Crouse, and John P. McDermott, defendants. In the bill it was alleged that the Homestead Company had been in possession of the lands since 1861, and "that they have paid taxes thereon to the State of Iowa since, * * * and if their title has failed they are entitled to have their taxes refunded since 1861 by the holder of the legal title who has not paid them."

As to the defendants Wolcott, Welles, Burrows, Edwin C. Litchfield, McAlpine, Chapman, Albert H. Tracy, Francis W. Tracy, Harriet Tracy, Electus B. Litchfield, Wade, and Stryker, it was alleged that they held title to certain parcels of the lands under the river grant. The defendants Colter, Crouse, and McDermott were alleged to be preemption claimants. The Des Moines Navigation and Railroad Company was the corporation to which the State transferred the river grant, and from which the other defendants, who hold under that grant, got their respective titles. The Des Moines Valley Railroad Company was made a defendant because of its claim of title to lands involved in the suit but which did not pass to the Des Moines Navigation and Railroad Company under the river grant. The prayer of the bill as to the several claimants under the river grant was that the Homestead Company might be quieted in its title, and "that, in the event of a decree that the plaintiff's present title, or any part of it, has failed, the Des Moines Navigation and Railroad Company and its assigns may be decreed to repay to the plaintiff all taxes which he has paid on said lands, and interest thereon."

Afterwards, on the 13th of October, 1868, Edwin C. Litchfield, Electus B. Litchfield, and John Stryker, three of the defendants, and citizens of New York, filed their petition for the removal of the suit to the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Iowa, under the Act of March 2, 1867, 14 Stat. at L. 558, chap. 196, on the ground of "prejudice or local influence." This petition was accepted by the state court and an order entered "That this cause be transferred to the said circuit court * * * as to said defendants in re." Under this order the petitioning parties entered a copy of the record in the circuit court on the 17th of March, 1869; and during the summer or fall of that year the defendants, the Des Moines Navigation and Railroad Company, the Tracys, the Litchfields, Wolcott, Chapman, McAlpine, Welles, Wade, and Stryker, all answered, setting up their titles under the river grant to the specific tracts of land held by them respectively, and, as to the taxes paid by the Homestead Company averring that they were paid "voluntarily, with a knowledge of all the facts, and that the complainant is not entitled to have the same or any part thereof refunded."

On the 13th of May, 1870, the following entry was made by the circuit court in the cause: "The Iowa Homestead Company, Complainant,

"The Des Moines Navigation & Railroad Company, Samuel G. Wolcott, Wm. B. Welles, Roswell S. Burrows, Edwin C. Litchfield, Wm. J. McAlpine, Richard B. Chapman, Albert H. Tracy, Francis W. Tracy, Harriet Tracy, Electus B. Litchfield, Edward Wade. John Stryker et al., Defendants.

"This action was commenced in the District Court of Webster County, Iowa, at the October Term of said district court. The defendants, Edwin C. Litchfield, Electus B. Litchfield, and John Stryker, filed their affidavit, bond, and petition asking the removal of this action from said district court to this court, under the provisions of the Act of Congress approved March 2, 1867, entitled 'An Act to Amend an Act for the Removal of Causes in Certain Cases from the State Court,' approved July 27, 1866.

"And it appearing to said district court that said Edwin C. Litchfield, Electus B. Litchfield, and John Stryker were nonresidents of the State of Iowa and residents of the State of New York, and that their application for the removal of this cause to this court in all respects conformed to the requirements of said Act of Congress, the said district court, at the October Term thereof, in the year 1868, made the usual order transferring and removing this cause to this court as to the defendants Edwin C. Litchfield, Electus B. Litchfield, and John Stryker; and this cause as to said defendants was removed to this court for trial.

"And it appearing that the defendants, Samuel G. Wolcott, Wm. B. Welles, Roswell S. Burrows, Wm. J. McAlpine, Richard B. Chapman, Albert H. Tracy, Francis W. Tracy, Harriet Tracy, and Edward Wade, are, each and every of them, nonresidents of the State of Iowa and District of Iowa, and under the statute above referred to are also entitled to a removal of this cause from the state court, and that said defendants, with the express consent and approval of the plaintiff, have appeared and answered the bill herein, and asked to be made parties defendant, and that their rights may be heard and determined in this court and on the trial of this action.

"And it further appearing to this court that the defendants so asking to be made parties defendant hold under the same title as the defendants Edwin C. Litchfield, Electus B. Litchfield and John Stryker, and that their defense is in all respects identical, with the said plaintiff consenting, it is ordered that said Samuel G. Wolcott, Wm. B. Welles, Roswell S. Burrows, Wm. J. McAlpine, Richard B. Chapman, Albert H. Tracy, Francis W. Tracy, Harriet Tracy, and Edward Wade, and each and every of them, be made parties defendant herein; that the answer filed by said persons be taken and deemed their answer to the complainant's bill; and that by their appearance and answer herein the said persons be deemed and treated as defendants herein and their rights in the premises adjudicated in and by this court in this action."

Afterwards the case came to this court in due course on appeal, where, on the 28th of April, 1873, it was decided that the defendants holding under the river grant had the better title, and that the Homestead company could not recover for the taxes because they were paid voluntarily, without any request from the owners of the land and with a full knowledge of all the facts. A decree was thereupon entered affirming a decree of the circuit court dismissing the bill. Iowa Homestead Co. v. Des Moines Valley R. R. Co. 84 U. S. 17 Wall. 153 [21:622].

The Dubuque and Sioux City Railroad Company assigned to Edward K. Goodnow, then in life, all its claims against the owners of the lands in dispute for taxes paid; and he, on the 26th of July, 1880, brought suits in the Circuit Court of Webster County, one against John Stryker, one against the executor of Edwin C. Litchfield, one against Richard B. Chapman, one against Grace H. Litchfield, and, on the 30th of June, 1881, another against the executor and grantees of William B. Welles, to recover from them respectively the amounts due for the taxes of 1861, 1862 and 1863, paid by the railroad company on their several tracts of land.

As defenses to the actions each of the defendants set up in his answer:

1. That, as to the taxes of 1861 and 1862, the lands belonged at the time of the levies respectively to the United States; "that the title thereto was in the United States, and that said lands were not subject to taxation by Webster County for any purpose for said years, and that if any taxes were assessed and levied thereon for the years aforesaid the same were not a valid or binding lien upon said lands."

2. That Goodnow and his assignor were estopped by the decree in the suit of the Homestead Company against the Des Moines Navigation and Railroad Company and others from a recovery in this action, that suit having been brought, among other things, for the same taxes, and having been prosecuted under the advice and direction of the Dubuque and Sioux City Railroad Company, before its assignment to Goodnow.

In the suits against Chapman, Welles, the executor of Edwin C. Litchfield, and Grace H. Litchfield, an additional defense was made, to wit: that the decision of this court, at December Term, 1866, in the case of Wolcott v. Des Moines Nav. & R. R. Co. 72 U. S. 5 Wall. 681 [18:689], was a final determination of the disputed questions as to the title and ownership of the lands above the Raccoon Fork in controversy between the Dubuque and Sioux City Railroad Company and the Des Moines Navigation and Railroad Company and its grantees under their respective claims, and that, as these suits were not brought within either five or six years after that decision, they were barred by the Statute of Limitations.

The Supreme Court of Iowa, on appeal from the decree of the Webster Circuit Court in each of the cases, overruled these defenses, denied to the defendants the rights, privileges, and immunities by them respectively set up and claimed under the laws and authority of the United States, and gave judgment against them for the taxes sued for. To reverse those judgments these writs of error were brought. The cases are reported as Goodnow v. Stryker, 62 Iowa, 221; Goodnow v. Chapman, 64 Iowa, 602; Goodnow v. Litchfield, 67 Iowa, 692; Goodnow v. Wells, 67 Iowa, 654.

The federal questions relied on in argument are:

1. That as the title to the lands remained in the United States until March 2, 1861, and as by the Act of March 3, 1845, chap. 48, § 7, 5 Stat. at L. 743, admitting Iowa into the Union as a State, it was provided that the State should not levy any tax on public lands within its limits "whilst the same remained the property of the United States," the taxes for the year 1861 were illegal and void, because levied in violation of that Act of Congress.

2. That the decree in the case of Iowa Homestead Co. v. Des Moines Valley R. R. Co. was in its legal effect a bar to the recovery in this action, and as the Supreme Court of the State decided otherwise it failed to give full faith and credit to the judicial proceedings of this court acting under the authority of the United States.

3. That the judgment of this court in the case of Wolcott v. Des Moines Nav. & R. R. Co. was a final determination on the 13th of May, 1867, against the right of the Dubuque and Sioux City Railroad Company to claim the lands on which the taxes were levied in these cases, and that the legal effect of that judgment was to bar the right of the railroad company, and Goodnow as its assignee, to recover in this action, because the action was not commenced within the time prescribed by the Statute of Limitations after the rendition of that judgment.

These will be considered in their order.

1. As to the taxes of 1861. It is not contended that these taxes were actually levied upon the lands until after the title had passed out of the United States; but the claim is that, by the laws of Iowa in force at the time, "government lands entered or located, or lands purchased from the State, shall not be taxed for the year in which the entry, location, or purchase was made," and that, as these taxes were levied within the year after the title passed out of the United States, they were illegal.

Whether the lands were taxable within a year after the title passed out of the United States is not a federal question. There was nothing in the Act of Congress admitting Iowa into the Union, or in any other Act of Congress to which our attention has been directed, which in any manner interfered with the power of the State to tax lands as soon as they ceased to be the property of the United States. The only prohibition was against taxation whilst the United States were the owners.

The Supreme Court of Iowa has decided that the statute of the State referred to does not apply to these cases, because these lands were neither "entered" nor "located" within the meaning of those terms as applied to the acquisition of lands from the government. Consequently there was nothing in the laws of Iowa to prevent the levy of the taxes for 1861 as soon as the Resolution of March 2, 1861, went into effect. Goodnow v. Wells, 67 Iowa, 654. This, it was said, is in accordance with previous cases bearing on the same question, among which Stryker v. Polk County, 22 Iowa, 131, and Litchfield v. Hamilton County, 40 Iowa, 66, were referred to. With the correctness of this decision we have nothing to do. It relates only to the construction of a state statute which is in no way in conflict with the Constitution or any law of the United States. The judgment of the state court on that question is final, and not reviewable here.

We are referred, however, to Litchfield v. Hamilton County, 101 U. S. 781 [25: 928] as an authority to the contrary of this. That was a suit in equity brought by Edwin C. Litchfield against the County of Hamilton, in a court of the State, to restrain the collection of taxes for the years 1859, 1860, 1861, 1862, 1863, 1864 and 1865 on lands owned by him in that county, and held under a title similar to that in these cases. The Supreme Court of the State decided (Litchfield v. Hamilton County, 40 Iowa, 66) that the taxes for all the years were collectible, and to reverse a decree to that effect the case was brought here upon a writ of error. It was submitted on printed arguments when it was reached in the regular call of the docket. A few days before this submission was made an appeal in the suit of Litchfield v. Webster County, 101 U. S. 773, [25: 925] brought in the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Iowa, to enjoin the collection of taxes levied by the County of Webster, for the same years, on lands similarly situated in that county, was submitted under Rule 20, and the two cases were before us for consideration at the same time. We decided unanimously that the lands were not taxable for the years 1859, 1860, and 1861, and the principal opinion was prepared in the case of Webster County, which, being here on appeal from the circuit court, was open for consideration upon its merits, without any reference to the limitation of our authority for the review of the judgments of the courts of the States. There was no doubt of our jurisdiction in that case to decide as to the taxes of 1861; and in doing so we held that, as under the Statute of Iowa government lands could not be taxed during the year they were entered or located, these lands were exempt for that year. The case of Hamilton County involved precisely the same questions in the state courts as did that of Webster County in the circuit court. The two cases were argued here substantially in the same way, and in that of Hamilton County our attention was not specially directed to any difference in the federal question presented by the tax for 1861 from that involved in the taxes for 1859 and 1860. The ground of decision in the court below was the same for all the years; and, without noticing the distinction which is now made as to our right to decide in that case upon the validity of the tax of 1861, we allowed the judgment to follow that in the case of Webster County, the two cases being exactly the same on their merits. It now appears we were in error in taking jurisdiction and reversing the judgment in the Hamilton County Case for the tax of 1861. The Supreme Court of the State has also decided in the case of Goodnow v. Wells, ubi supra, that we erred in the decision of the question involved in the tax of 1861 on its merits, because we held that lands acquired from the United States by the title which was then and now under consideration came within the statutory exemption from taxation in the State for one year after the United States ceased to be the owner, having been misled, as is supposed, by an incorrect statement of the law in McGregor & M. R. Co. v. Brown, 39 Iowa, 655, to the effect that "Government lands are not taxable until a year after they are patented." We may remark also, that, in our opinion, the conclusion then reached by us received further support from the cases of the Iowa Falls & S. C. R. R. Co. v. Cherokee County, 37 Iowa, 483; Goodrich v. Beaman, Id. 563; Iowa Falls & S. C. R. R. Co. v. Woodbury County, 38 Iowa, 498. But whether we were right then on this question or not, it is unnecessary now to consider, as upon the present record we are clearly of opinion that the decision of the court below, to the effect that the lands were taxable for the year 1861, is not reviewable here. That question is one on which the decision of the highest court of the State is conclusive.

2. As to the estoppel by the decree in the case of the Iowa Homestead Co. v. Des Moines Valley R. Co. supra:

That suit did not embrace the taxes for the years 1861, 1862 and 1863 paid by the Dubuque and Sioux City Railroad Company. The Homestead Company did not acquire title to the lands until November 12, 1863, and it only paid the taxes for 1864 and thereafter. The conveyance by the Railroad Company to the Homestead Company did not profess to transfer the claim of the Railroad Company against the holders of the river-grant title for taxes paid or to be paid. The suit of the Homestead Company was for the land, or the taxes it had paid. There was no reference in the pleadings to taxes paid by the Railroad Company, and no claim was made for anything except the payments by the Homestead Company itself. The Homestead Company did not profess to sue as trustee for the Railroad Company. It is true that the Railroad Company, as warrantor of the title of the Homestead Company, aided in the prosecution of that suit, and that the decree may be conclusive evidence of a failure of title in a suit brought by the Homestead Company against the Railroad Company to recover damages for a breach of the covenants of warranty in the deed for the lands; but as the taxes paid by the Railroad Company were in no way involved in the suit, neither the Railroad Company nor the defendants in that suit were concluded as to them by anything contained in the decree. The decision may be referred to as a judicial precedent for holding that taxes paid under the circumstances in which these were paid could not be recovered by the party paying them from the true owners of the land; but it is in no sense a judgment in a suit between the same parties upon the same cause of action as is here involved, and therefore a bar to the recovery in these cases. In our opinion the court below did not fail in its decision to give full faith and credit to that decree.

3. As to the effect of the judgment in Wolcott v. Des Moines Nav. & R. R. Co. upon the operation of the Statute of Limitations in these cases:

That was a suit between a purchaser of a single half section of the river lands above the Raccoon Fork against his vendor, the Des Moines Navigation and Railroad Company, to recover damages for a breach of the covenants of warranty in the deed of conveyance to him. There was no party to the suit except Wolcott and the Navigation Company. Wolcott claimed nothing under the railroad grant or under the railroad company. It is true that the ground of his action was the superior title of the railroad company as against that of the Navigation Company at the time of the conveyance of the latter company to himself; but he was neither suing for the railroad company nor representing it in the action, so far as anything appears in these records or in that. His suit was nothing more or less than to recover damages from the Navigation Company for a breach of covenants of warranty with himself, in which neither the railroad company nor anyone claiming under it had any interest. The judgment in the action was conclusive as between him and the Navigation Company upon the cause of action involved, but as to no one else. It settled no title between the Navigation Company or its grantees and the Railroad Company or those claiming under that company. That decision is indeed referred to in the case of Iowa Homestead Co. v. Des Moines Valley R. Co. ubi supra, as "settling" "the question of title to the Des Moines River lands," but that was only in the way of judicial authority as a precedent, and not as an estoppel. The legal operation and effect of the judgment as an estoppel was confined to the title of the parties in that suit to the particular half section of land then in controversy. As to any other tract of the river lands and as to any other parties, it stood, in the language of Mr. Justice Miller in Williams v. Baker, 84 U. S. 17 Wall. 144 [21: 561] only as "an authoritative exposition" of the views of the court on a question which "was argued fully by parties deeply interested on both sides" and which "received attentive consideration," and was, therefore, "entitled to the same weight as other well considered cases." The judgment can be referred to by the parties to this suit as a precedent, but not as an estoppel.

We have not overlooked the fact that a brief was filed at the hearing in this court on behalf of the Railroad Company to support the claim of Wolcott that the title of that company was the best. Such a proceeding did not make the Railroad Company a party to the suit, or bind it by the decree. Being interested in the question to be decided, the company was anxious to secure a judgment that could not be used as a precedent against its own claims in any litigation that might thereafter arise in repect to its own property. It is not an uncommon thing in this court to allow briefs to be presented by or on behalf of persons who are not parties to the suit, but who are interested in the questions to be decided; and it has never been supposed that the judgment in such case would estop the intervener in a suit of his own which presented the same questions. It could be used as a precedent, but not as an estoppel in the second suit.

We find no error in the decisions of the Supreme Court of Iowa upon any of the federal questions involved in these cases, and each of the judgments is consequently affirmed.

EDWARD H. LITCHFIELD, Admr. of GRACE H. LITCHFIELD, Plff. in Err.,
v.
GEORGE CRANE, Admr. of EDWARD K. GOODNOW.

Prior adjudication—estoppel.

1. A prior adjudication is not binding on, nor conclusive as to the rights of, one who was not a party to the suit in which the adjudication was had, although he interested himself in securing the adjudication and paid part of the expenses of the suit; those only who are represented by the parties, and claim under them, or in privity with them, are bound by a judgment.

2. Estoppels to be good must be mutual.

Reported below, 68 Iowa, 275.

The facts and case are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. C. H. Gatch and William Connor, for plaintiff in error:

The record presents two federal questions:

First. Whether or not the plaintiff in error was entitled to immunity from the demand of the defendant in error, under the decision and judgment of this court in the case of Iowa Homestead Co. v. Des Moines Valley R. R. Co. 84 U. S. 17 Wall. 153 (21:622).

Second. The plaintiff in error claimed immunity from the demand of the defendant in error, because, by force and virtue of the decision of this court in the case of Wolcott v. Des Moines Nav. & R. R. Co. 72 U. S. 5 Wall. 681 (18: 689), and Burr v. Des Moines Nav. & R. R. Co. 68 U. S. 1 Wall. 99 (17:561), the cause of action accrued, if ever, at the date of said decision, and was, therefore, at the commencement of this suit, barred by the Statute of Limitations of the State of New York.

If Grace H. Litchfield was a party to the Homestead Company Case in such sense that she might claim the benefit of the adjudication, then it will not be denied that the claim of immunity thereunder involves a federal question of which this court has jurisdiction.

In Robbins v. Chicago, 71 U. S. 4 Wall. 657 (18: 427), this court, on page 674 [430] stated the rule generally as to when persons other than parties of record are bound by the adjudication.

In Conger v. Chilcote, 42 Iowa, 18, it was held that one who is benefited by the prosecution of an action of which he has notice is to be regarded as a party in interest, although his name does not appear therein, and he is bound by the judgment rendered.

Stoddard v. Thompson, 31 Iowa, 80.

One who, though not a party, defends or prosecutes an action by employing counsel, paying costs, and by doing those things which are usually done by a party, is bound by the judgment rendered therein.

Tarleton v. Johnson, 25 Ala. 300; S. C. 60 Am. Am. Dec. 515; Freem. Judg. §§ 174, 175; Barney v. Dewey, 13 Johns. 224.

If Mrs. Litchfield was a "real defendant," though not "a party to the record," the dependence of the defense of prior adjudication upon the question whether she was or not makes that question as above claimed a federal question.

Mackay v. Dillon, 45 U. S. 4 How. 421 (11: 1088); Kennedy v. Hunt, 48 U. S. 7 How. 586 (12:829).

Does the question, whether or not the decision of this court in the case of Wolcott v. Des Moines Nav. R. R. 72 U. S. 5 Wall. 681 (18:689) was a final determination of the question of title, and the decision of the Supreme Court of Iowa, holding it not to have been, and thereby defeating the defense of the New York Statute of Limitations, present a federal question?—and if so, was the decision of the Supreme Court of Iowa, holding the decision in question not to have been such final determination, erroneous?

Plaintiff in error maintained that the decision in these cases was a final determination of the question, while the court held that the question was not finally decided until the cases of Williams v. Baker, 84 U. S. 17 Wall. 144 (21: 561), and Iowa Homestead Co. v. Des Moines Valley R. R. Co., supra.

The Homestead Company must be treated as having been a party to the Wolcott and Burr Cases for the purposes of this question.

Upon this point the case is within the principle of the following decisions of this court: Dupasseur v. Rochereau, 88 U. S. 21 Wall. 130 (22:588;) Embry v. Palmer, 107 U. S. 20 (27:352); Crescent City L. S. Co. v. Butchers Union S. H. & L. S. L. Co. 120 U. S. 143, (30:615); Factors & T. Ins. Co. v. Murphy, 111 U. S. 738 (28:582).

Mr. George Crane, for defendant in error:

Where a state court refuses to give effect to the judgment of a court of the United States rendered upon the point in dispute and with jurisdiction of the case and the parties, a question is undoubtedly raised which under the Act of 1867 may be brought to this court for decision.

Dupasseur v. Rochereau, 88 U. S. 21 Wall. 134 22:590); Embry v. Palmer, 107 U. S. 3 (27:346).

Under the rule recognized since the Act of Congress of July 5, 1867, this court is authorized to examine the opinions of the state courts to ascertain what has been decided.

Murdock v. Memphis, 87 U. S. 20 Wall. 633 (23:443); McManus v. O'Sullivan, 91 U. S. 578 (23:390).

The simple payment of a portion of the expenses of defending a lawsuit will not entitle the person so paying to the protection or benefit of the judgment therein rendered, though the person paying may be interested in questions similar to those involved in that suit.

Messrs. C. H. Gatch and William Connor, for plaintiff in error, in reply:

In answer to our opening argument that defendant in error is estopped by the adjudication in the case of Iowa Homestead Co. v. Des Moines Valley R. R. Co. 84 U. S. 17 Wall. 153 (21: 622), it is objected that that adjudication was void for want of jurisdiction because all of the defendants in the former suit were not citizens of a different State from that of which the plaintiff was a citizen.

It is too late to question the jurisdiction of the circuit court after the cause has been sent back by mandate.

Skillern v. May, 10 U. S. 6 Cranch. 267 (3:220); McCormick v. Sullivant, 23 U. S. 10 Wheat. 192 (6:300).

If the jurisdiction of a circuit court be not shown in the proceedings in the case, its judgment is erroneous and liable to be reversed, but is not an absolute nullity.

Kennedy v. Georgia State Bank, 49 U. S. 8 How. 586 (12:1209).

In Washington Bridge Co. v. Stewart, 44 U. S. 3 How. 413 (11:658) it was held: After a case has been decided upon its merits and remanded to the court below, if it is again brought up on a second appeal it is then too late to allege that the court had not jurisdiction to try the first appeal.

In DeSobry v. Nicholson, 70 U. S. 3 Wall. 420 (18:263), it was held: A motion to dismiss a case for want of proper citizenship in the parties cannot be made at the trial and after pleading a general issue and special defenses.

As to when and how far this court will consider and determine questions of state or common law for purposes which involve questions giving it jurisdiction, we refer to the following authorities:

Martin v. Hunter, 14 U. S. 1 Wheat. 304 (4:97); Smith v. Maryland, 10 U. S. 6 Cranch, 286 (3:225).

This suit was brought by Edward K. Goodnow, assignee of the Iowa Homestead Company, in his lifetime, against Grace H. Litchfield, in her lifetime, to recover the amount of taxes for the years 1864 to 1871, both inclusive, paid by the Homestead Company on certain tracts of Des Moines River lands held and owned by her, by and through conveyances from the Des Moines Navigation and Railroad Company. For a general statement of the facts reference is made to Stryker v. Crane, ante. The taxes were paid before the decree in Iowa Homestead Co. v. Des Moines Valley R. R. Co. 84 U. S. 17 Wall. 153 [21: 622], and the assignment was made to Goodnow afterwards. As defenses to the action, the prior adjudication in that case was pleaded in bar, and also the Statute of Limitations, based on the decision as to title in Wolcott v. Des Moines Nav. & R. R. Co. 72 U. S. 5 Wall. 681 [18: 689], the same as in Stryker v. Crane.

Both these defenses were overruled by the Supreme Court of the State, and judgment was entered in that court for the amount of taxes paid and interest. Goodnow v. Litchfield, 68 Iowa, 275.

As to the federal question arising on the Statute of Limitations, it is only necessary to refer to what was said on that subject in Stryker v. Crane, ante. There was no error in the decision of the court below on that point.

The defense of prior adjudication is disposed of by the fact that Mrs. Litchfield was not a party to the suit in which the adjudication relied on was had. At the time of the commencement of the suit she was the owner of her lands, and they were described in the bill; but neither she nor anyone who represented her title was named as a defendant. She interested herself in securing a favorable decision of the questions involved as far as they were applicable to her own interests, and paid part of the expenses; but there was nothing to bind her by the decision. If it had been adverse to her interest no decree could have been entered against her personally, either for the lands or the taxes. Her lands were entirely separate and distinct from those of the actual parties. A decree in favor of or against them and their title was in no legal sense a decree in favor of or against her. She was indirectly interested in the result, but not directly. As the questions affecting her own title and her own liability for taxes were similar to those involved in the suit, the decision could be used as a judicial precedent in a proceeding against her, but not as a judgment binding on her and conclusive as to her rights. Her rights were similar to but not identical with those of the persons who were actually parties to the litigation.

Greenleaf, in his Treatise on the Law of Evidence, Vol. I, section 523, states the rule applicable to this class of cases thus: "Under the term parties, in this connection, the law includes all who are directly interested in the subject matter and had a right to make defense or to control the proceedings and to appeal from the judgment. This right involves also the right to adduce testimony and to cross examine the witnesses adduced on the other side. Persons not having these rights are regarded as strangers to the cause. But to give full effect to the principle by which parties are held bound by a judgment, all persons who are represented by the parties and claim under them, or in privity with them, are equally concluded by the same proceedings. We have already seen that the term privity denotes mutual or successive relationship to the same rights of property. The ground, therefore, upon which persons standing in this relation to the litigating party are bound by the proceedings to which he was a party is that they are identified with him in interest; and whenever this identity is found to exist, all are alike concluded. Hence, all privies, whether in estate, in blood or in law, are estopped from litigating that which is conclusive on him with whom they are in privity." The correctness of this statement has been often affirmed by this court (Lovejoy v. Murphy, 70 U. S. 3 Wall. 1, 19 [18: 129, 134]; Robbins v. Chicago, 71 U. S. 4 Wall. 657, 673 [18: 427, 430]), and the principle has been recognized in many cases. Indeed, it is elementary. Hale v. Finch, 104 U. S. 261, 265 [26: 732, 733]; Brooklyn, C. & N. R. R. Co. v. National Bank, 102 U. S. 14, 22 [26: 61, 64]; Butterfield v. Smith, 101 U. S. 570 [25: 868].

In the condition of parties to the record during the whole course of the litigation between the Homestead Company and those who were named as defendants, Mrs. Litchfield had no right to make a defense in her own name; neither could she control the proceedings nor appeal from the decree. She could not in her own right adduce testimony or cross examine witnesses. Neither was she identified in interest with anyone who was a party. She owned her lands; the parties to the suit owned theirs; her rights were all separate and distinct from the rest, and there was no mutual or successive relationship between her and the other owners.

She was neither a party to the suit nor in privity with those who were parties; consequently she was in law a stranger to the proceedings and in no way bound thereby. As she was not bound, the Homestead Company and its assigns were not. Estoppels to be good must be mutual. This was in effect the decision of the court below, and it was right.

It follows that there is no error in the record, and the judgment is affirmed.

DES MOINES NAVIGATION AND RAILROAD COMPANY, Plff. in Err.,

v.

IOWA HOMESTEAD COMPANY.

Federal question—decree of this court, when valid.

1. That a federal question was not presented in the brief of counsel in the state court is not sufficient reason for that court omitting to consider it, when it was fairly presented by the pleadings, proofs, and assignment of errors, and necessarily involved in the determination of the case. A refusal to consider a federal question which is controlling in a case is equivalent to a decision against the federal right involved therein.

2. Where a suit was removed from a state court into the Circuit Court of the United States, and all the parties in the suit appeared in the circuit court, without objection, the decree of this court, on appeal, is not void for want of jurisdiction, if it appears on the face of the record that some of the defendants who did not join in the petition for the removal were citizens of the same State with the plaintiff, but is a valid and subsisting adjudication of the matters in controversy, binding on the parties, and a bar to a subsequent action for the same cause.

Argued Nov. 1, 1887. Decided Dec. 5, 1887.

IN ERROR to the Supreme Court of the State of Iowa. Reversed.

The facts and case are fully stated in the opinion.

Messrs. C. H. Gatch and William Connor, for plaintiff in error:

The record presents two federal questions, either decided or the decision of which was necessary to the decree rendered by the Supreme Court of Iowa.

First. The plaintiff in error claimed immunity from the demand of the defendant in error, because, by force and virtue of the decisions of this court in the case of Wolcott v. Des Moines Nav. & R. R. Co. 72 U. S. 5 Wall. 681 (18: 689), and Burr v. Des Moines Nav. & R. R. Co. 1 Wall. 99 (17: 561); and the cause of action accrued, if ever, at the date of said decision, and was, therefore, at the commencement of this suit, barred by the Statute of Limitations of the State of Iowa.

The decision of this question, and the necessity therefor, by the Supreme Court of Iowa, are thus stated in the certificate:

Our decision herein was and is that said decision was not a final determination of said question, and was and is against the immunity so claimed because of our said decision that said determination was not final.

Second. Whether or not the plaintiff in error was entitled to immunity from the demand of the defendant in error, under the decision and judgment of this court in the case of Iowa Homestead Co. v. Des Moines Valley R. R. Co. 84 U. S. 17 Wall. 153 (21: 622), the controversy therein having been, as plaintiff in error claims, and, as is alleged in its answer, between the same parties, and upon the same issue, and for the same demand, and the decision and judgment therein having been against the validity of such demand.

Plaintiff in error maintained that the decision in these cases was a final determination of the question; while the court held that the question was not finally decided until 1873, meaning in the cases of Williams v. Baker, 84 U. S. 17 Wall. 144 (21. 561), and Iowa Homestead Co. v. Des Moines Valley R. R. Co. supra; and, because of so holding necessarily further held that the action was not barred.

The Wolcott-Burr decision has repeatedly been reaffirmed.

The case is within the principle of the following decisions of this court:

Whether due effect has been given by a state court to a judgment or decree of a court of the United States is a federal question.

Factors & T. Ins. Co. v. Murphy, 111 U. S. 738 (28: 582).

That the defense of former adjudication by this court, as shown by the record, presents a federal question is not controverted; but it is claimed that it was waived by failure of plaintiff in error to insist upon it in his printed argument filed in the state court.

Where the judgment of the state court is not in favor of the party claiming the right or immunity, the case is within the jurisdiction of this court.

It is sufficient to give jurisdiction, if a federal question, essential to the decision of the case, is properly before the court for decision.

Crowell v. Randell, 35 U. S. 10 Pet. 368 (9: 458); Miller v. Nicholls, 17 U. S. 4 Wheat. 311 (4: 578); Hickie v. Starke, 26 U. S. 1 Pet. 98 (7: 69) Wilson v. Blackbird Cr. M. Co. 27 U. S. 2 Pet. 245 (7: 412); Craig v. Missouri, 29 U. S. 4 Pet. 410 (7: 903); Williams v. Norris, 25 U. S. 12 Wheat. 117 (6: 571); Williams v. Bruffy, 102 U. S. 248 (26: 135); Chicago L. Ins. Co. v. Needles, 113 U. S. 574 (28: 1084); Brown v. Colorado, 106 U. S. 97 (27: 133); McManus v O'Sullivan, 91 U. S. 578 (23: 390); Murdock v. Memphis, supra.

It must appear that the federal question was actually decided, or that its decision was necessary to the judgment or decree in the case.

How. 421 (11: 1033); Kennedy v. Hunt, 48 U. S. 7 How. 586 (12: 829).

Mr. George Crane, for defendant in error:

The opinion of the state court shows conclusively that the question whether the judgment in the Homestead suit constituted a bar to appellee's claim in this suit, was not considered or passed upon by the Supreme Court of Iowa.

This court will examine the opinion of the state court to ascertain what was decided by that court. In its opinion the Supreme Court of Iowa uses this language:

In view of the want of agreement between counsel we are required to hold that the question of prior adjudication cannot be determined in this case.

In Iowa errors assigned which are not discussed or insisted upon in argument will not be considered. Only errors presented in argument will be considered.

Shaw v. Brown, 18 Iowa, 508; Cook v. Sioux City & P. R. R. Co. 37 Iowa, 426; Bremer County Bank v. Bremer County, 42 Iowa, 394.

In order to give this court jurisdiction it must appear affirmatively on the face of the record, not only that a federal question was raised and presented to the highest court of the State for decision, but that it was decided, or that its decision was necessary to the judgment or decree rendered in the case.

In Skillern v. May, 10 U. S. 6 Cranch, 267 (3: 220), it was held too late to question the jurisdiction of the circuit court after the cause has been sent back by mandate.

McCormick v. Sullivant, 23 U. S. 10 Wheat. 192 (6: 300); Kennedy v. Georgia State Bank, 49 U. S. 8 How. 586 (12: 1209); Washington Bridge Co. v. Stewart, 44 U. S. 3 How. 413 (11: 658); De Sobry v. Nicholson, 70 U. S. 3 Wall. 420 (18: 263).

When and how far this court will consider and determine questions of state or common law, for purposes which involve questions giving it jurisdiction:

This suit was brought by the Iowa Homestead Company against the Des Moines Navigation and Railroad Company, to recover the same taxes for the years 1864 to 1871, both inclusive, which formed part of the subject matter of the litigation between the same parties in Iowa Homestead Co. v. Des Moines Valley R. R. Co. 84 U. S. 17 Wall. 153 [21: 622], referred to in Stryker v. Crane, ante—. The Railroad Company set up the decree in its favor in that suit as a bar to the present action; and to this the Homestead Company replied "that the decree or judgment referred to is null and void, for the reason that the courts of the United States had no jurisdiction of said suit, and no legal power or authority to render said decree or judgment."

Upon this part of the case the facts admitted were substantially the same as are set forth in Stryker v. Crane, ante, with the addition of this stipulation made by the parties and filed in the circuit court:

"And it is further stipulated that the defendants, Samuel G. Wolcott, Edwin C. Litchfield, Edward Wade, and John Stryker, each and every one of whom are citizens of New York, and the Des Moines Navigation and Railroad Company, duly appeared in this court and filed their joint and several answers to complainant's bill, duly verified; that the said answers are not now found with the papers in this cause; that the said answers of said defendants were substantially in all respects like those of the defendants William B. Welles and Albert Tracy, on file herein and duly verified by them, respectively, except such changes, variations, and alterations as were necessary to present the interests held by said defendants respectively, in the land in this action."

Other defenses were set up in the answer similar to those in Stryker v. Crane, ante; Chapman v. Crane, ante; and Litchfield v. Crane, ante; but it is unnecessary to restate them here.

The case was taken to the Supreme Court of the State on appeal, and among the errors assigned there was this:

"The court erred in holding that plaintiff was not estopped from prosecuting this suit by the former adjudication in the former suit of the Iowa Homestead Company against the Des Moines Navigation and Railroad Company and others."

At the hearing in the Supreme Court a final decree was entered against the Navigation and Railroad Company for the full amount of taxes paid and the interest. The opinion of the court, so far as it related to the question of former adjudication, was in these words:

"The question of former adjudication, discussed in the fifth point of the foregoing opinion, is not discussed by counsel for defendant in this case in his printed brief, though it was pleaded as a defense. Counsel for plaintiff in this case filed a printed brief used in the former case, but upon the fifth point it is not at all applicable, for the reason that the facts involved in the pleas of former adjudication are not identical in each case. The two cases were discussed at the oral argument together, all the points involved in each case being considered; but we were left to the printed briefs and abstracts in order to make application of the arguments properly to the separate cases. Since the submission of the cases counsel for each party has been called upon to express his understanding of the points to be determined in the cases separately. Counsel for defendant claims that the question of prior adjudication, while not presented in his printed brief, was argued orally, and is, therefore, in this case; counsel for plaintiff claims that it is not. Certain is it that it is not made in the printed brief for defendant, and we are unable to say that it was made on the oral argument as applicable to this case. The counsel for defendant having failed to present this point in his brief, he cannot, according to the spirit of our rules, urge it in oral argument. In view of the want of agreement between counsel, we are required to hold that the question of prior adjudication cannot be determined in this case." Iowa

The "foregoing opinion" referred to was that in the case of the Administrator of Mrs. Grace H. Litchfield v. Crane, ante, 199. The record in that case, taken in connection with that in this, shows that the answer setting up the former adjudication, the reply thereto, and the assignment of errors on this point, were the same in both of the cases. They differed in their facts only in that Mrs. Litchfield was not actually a party to the former suit upon the face of the record, and the Navigation and Railroad Company was.

We cannot look upon the reason given by the court below for not considering the question of prior adjudication as sufficient for avoiding the decision of a controlling federal question fairly presented by the pleadings, proofs, and assignment of errors, and necessarily involved in the determination of the case. That question stood in the very front of the litigation, and, if decided in favor of the Navigation and Railroad Company, ended the whole matter. To give a judgment the other way, without considering it, was simply to ignore one of the most important elements of the case as it stood in the record. There can be no escape from this conclusion.

It seems from the opinion, which, as part of the record, we must take notice of, that this case was argued in connection with that of the administrator of Mrs. Grace H. Litchfield. The defense of prior adjudication was made in both, though the facts in the case of Mrs. Litchfield were different from those in this. Mrs. Litchfield was not an actual party to the suit in which the prior adjudication was had, while the Navigation and Railroad Company was; but the question of the jurisdiction of the court for the determination of the rights of the parties was the same in both. In the oral argument, there being but one for the two cases, this point was raised and discussed; but in the printed briefs it was referred to only in that entitled in the suit of the administrator of Mrs. Litchfield. As it was the defense in this case, and, if sustained, made it unnecessary to consider anything else, we cannot decide that the court was justified in holding that it could not be determined. Such action was, in our opinion, equivalent to a decision against the federal right which was actually set up and claimed; and thus our jurisdiction for the review of the judgment on this question, as well as the others, is complete.

We proceed, then, to consider the only objection which has been made to this defense, and that is, the alleged want of jurisdiction in the courts of the United States—both this court and the circuit court—to entertain and finally dispose of the suit in which the prior adjudication was had. It must be conceded that the Homestead Company and the Navigation and Railroad Company were both Iowa corporations, and, therefore, in law, citizens of the same State; but the defendants, the Litchfields and Stryker, who caused the removal to be made, as well as Wolcott, Burrows, McAlpine, Chapman, the Tracys, and Wade, were citizens of the State of New York. After the removal was effected, all the above-named defendants, as well as Welles and the Navigation and Railroad Company, appeared, filed answers, and defended the action. The Homestead Company took issue on all the answers, and actually contested the matters in dispute with the Navigation and Railroad Company, as well as the other defendants, in the circuit court, and in this court on appeal, without taking any objection to the jurisdiction.

The precise question we have now to determine is whether the adjudication by this court, under such circumstances, of the matters then and now at issue between the Homestead Company and the Navigation and Railroad Company was absolutely void for want of jurisdiction. The point is not whether it was error in the circuit court to take jurisdiction of the suit, or of so much of it as related to the Navigation and Railroad Company, originally, but as to the binding effect of the decree of this court so long as it remains in force, and is not judicially annulled, vacated, or set aside.

It was decided in Hancock v. Holbrook, 119 U. S. 587 [30:538], that if a suit, in which there was but one controversy, between a citizen of the State in which the suit was brought and a citizen of another State, was removed from a state court to a circuit court of the United States on the ground of "prejudice or local influence," under subsection 3 of section 639 of the Revised Statutes, which is the reenactment, in the revision, of the Act of March 2, 1867, chap. 196, 14 Stat. at L. 558, in force when the proceedings now under consideration were had, it was not error in the circuit court to remand the suit if all the defendants were not citizens of different States from all the plaintiffs; but here the question is whether, if all the parties were actually before the circuit court, the decree of this court on appeal is absolutely void if it appears on the face of the record that some of the defendants who did not join in the petition for removal were citizens of the same State with the plaintiff.

It was settled by this court at a very early day that, although the judgments and decrees of the circuit courts might be erroneous, if the records failed to show the facts on which the jurisdiction of the court rested, such as that the plaintiffs were citizens of different States from the defendants, yet that they were not nullities, and would bind the parties until reversed or otherwise set aside. In Skillern v. May, 10 U. S. 6 Cranch, 267 [3:220], the circuit court had taken jurisdiction of a suit and rendered a decree. That decree was reversed by this court on appeal, and the cause remanded with directions to proceed in a particular way. When the case got back it was discovered that the cause was "not within the jurisdiction of the court," and the judges of the circuit court certified to this court that they were opposed in opinion on the question whether it could be dismissed for want of jurisdiction after this court had acted thereon. To that question the following answer was certified back: "It appearing that the merits of the cause had been finally decided in this court, and that its mandate required only the execution of its decree, it is the opinion of this court that the circuit court is bound to carry the decree into execution, although the jurisdiction of that court be not alleged in the pleadings." That was in 1810. In 1825, McCormick v. Sul- livant, 23 U. S. 10 Wheat. 192 [6:300], was decided by this court. There a decree in a former suit was pleaded in bar of the action. To this a replication was filed, alleging that the proceedings in the former suit were coram non judice, the record not showing that the complainants and defendants in that suit were citizens of different States; but this court held on appeal that "The courts of the United States are courts of limited, but not of inferior, jurisdiction. If the jurisdiction be not alleged in the proceedings, their judgments and decrees may be reversed for that cause on a writ of error or appeal; but until reversed they are conclusive between the parties and their privies." "But they are not nullities." There has never been any departure from this rule.

It is said, however, that these decisions apply only to cases where the record simply fails to show jurisdiction. Here it is claimed that the record shows there could be no jurisdiction, because it appears affirmatively that the Navigation and Railroad Company, one of the defendants, was a citizen of the same State with the plaintiff. But the record shows, with equal distinctness, that all the parties were actually before the court, and made no objection to its jurisdiction. The Act of 1867, under which the removal was had, provided that when a suit was pending in a state court "in which there is a controversy between a citizen of the State in which the suit is brought and a citizen of another State, * * * such citizen of another State, * * * if he will make and file an affidavit stating that he has reason to and does believe that, from prejudice or local influence, he will not be able to obtain justice in such state court, may * * * file a petition in such state court for the removal of the suit" into the Circuit Court of the United States; and, when all things have been done that the Act requires, "It shall be * * * the duty of the state court to * * * proceed no further with the suit," and, after the record is entered in the circuit court, "the suit shall then proceed in the same manner as if it had been brought there by original process."

In the suit now under consideration there was a separate and distinct controversy between the plaintiff, a citizen of Iowa, and each of the citizens of New York, who were defendants. Each controversy related to the several tracts of land claimed by each defendant individually, and not as joint owner with the other defendants. Three of the citizens of New York caused to be made and filed the necessary affidavit and petition for removal, and thereupon, by common consent apparently, the suit as an entirety was transferred to the circuit court for final adjudication as to all the parties. The plaintiff, as well as the defendants, appeared in the circuit court without objection, and that court proceeded as if its authority in the matter was complete. Whether in such a case the suit could be removed was a question for the circuit court to decide when it was called on to take jurisdiction. If it kept the case when it ought to have been remanded, or if it proceeded to adjudicate upon matters in dispute between two citizens of Iowa, when it ought to have confined itself to those between the citizen of Iowa and the citizens of New York, its final decree in the suit could have been reversed, on appeal, as erroneous; but the decree would not have been a nullity. To determine whether the suit was removable in whole or in part or not, was certainly within the power of the circuit court. The decision of that question was the exercise and the rightful exercise of jurisdiction, no matter whether in favor of or against taking the cause. Whether its decision was right, in this or any other respect, was to be finally determined by this court on appeal. As the circuit court entertained the suit, and this court, on appeal, impliedly recognized its right to do so, and proceeded to dispose of the case finally on its merits, certainly our decree cannot, in the light of prior adjudications on the same general question, be deemed a nullity. It was, at the time of the trial of the present case in the court below, a valid and subsisting prior adjudication of the matters in controversy, binding on these parties, and a bar to this action. In refusing so to decide the court failed to give full faith and credit to the decree of this court, under which the Navigation and Railroad Company claimed an immunity from all liability to the Homestead Company on account of the taxes sued for; and this was error.

For this reason, the judgment is reversed, and the cause is remanded for further proceedings, not inconsistent with this opinion.

PETER MUGLER, Plff. in Err.,
v.
STATE OF KANSAS.

SAME v. SAME.

STATE OF KANSAS, Appt.,
v.
HERMAN ZIEBOLD ET AL.

Kansas "Prohibition Law," constitutional—state liquor laws—police power—rights of property—Fourteenth Constitutional Amendment—private damages—common nuisance—equity proceedings—jury trial—evidence.

1. The Prohibition Law of the State of Kansas is not in conflict with that clause of the Fourteenth Amendment of the Constitution of the United States, which provides that "No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law."

2. Legislation by a State prohibiting the manufacture within her limits of intoxicating liquors, to be there sold or bartered for general use as a beverage, does not necessarily infringe any right, privilege, or immunity secured by the Constitution of the United States.

3. It belongs to the legislative department to exert what are known as the police powers of the State, and to determine, primarily, what measures are appropriate or needful for the protection of the public morals, the public health, or the public safety, subject to the power of the courts to adjudge whether any particular law is an invasion of rights secured by the Constitution.

4. Government does not interfere with, nor impair, anyone's constitutional rights of liberty or of property, when it determines that the manufacture and sale of intoxicating drinks, for general or individual use, as a beverage, are or may become hurtful to society, and constitute, therefore, a business in which no one may lawfully engage.

5. The Fourteenth Amendment of the Constitution does not take from the States those powers of police that were reserved at the time the original Constitution was adopted. The States did not intend, by adopting that Amendment, to impose restraints upon the exercise of their powers for the protection of the safety, health, or morals of the community.

6. A prohibition simply upon the use of property, for purposes that are declared, by valid legislation, to be injurious to the health, morals, or safety of the community, cannot, in any just sense, be deemed a taking or an appropriation of property for the public benefit. The State cannot be stayed from providing for the discontinuance of any manufacture or traffic which is injurious to the public morals, by any incidental inconvenience which individuals or corporations may suffer.

7. A State has power to declare that any place, kept and maintained for the illegal manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors, shall be deemed a common nuisance and be abated; and at the same time to provide for the indictment and trial of the offender.

8. Proceedings in equity for the purposes indicated in the 13th section of the Kansas Act of 1885 are not inconsistent with due process of law. A jury trial is not required in suits in equity brought to abate a public nuisance.

9. The provision that in prosecutions, by indictment or otherwise, the State need not, in the first instance, prove that the defendant has not the permit required by the statute, does not deprive him of the presumption that he is innocent of any violation of law.

The facts are fully stated in the opinion.

Mr. George G. Vest, for plaintiff in error in Nos. 19, 20, and for appellees, in No. 934:

These cases involve the constitutionality of what is known as the Prohibition Law of the State of Kansas.

The amendment to the State Constitution which prohibits the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors and the law of Kansas prohibiting the manufacture of any spirituous, malt, vinous, fermented, or other intoxicating liquors, except for medical, scientific, and mechanical purposes are in conflict with article 14 of the Constitution, which declares that "No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws."

But if the power and authority of the State Legislature to prohibit the manufacture of beer, whether for sale outside of the State or within it, shall be held to be absolute and unlimited, then we submit, upon the doctrines maintained by the Court of Appeals of New York, in the case of Wynehamer, 13 N. Y. 378, and by the circuit judge below, that in its application to the appellees' brewery, owned, possessed and used by them when the Act took effect, the Statute of Kansas violates the Fourteenth Amendment, because it deprives them of their property "without due process of law."

These cases involve an inquiry into the validity of certain Statutes of Kansas relating to the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors.

The first two are indictments, charging Mugler, the plaintiff in error, in one case, with having sold, and in the other, with having manufactured, spirituous, vinous, malt, fermented, and other intoxicating liquors, in Saline County, Kansas, without having the license or permit required by the statute. The defendant, having been found guilty, was fined, in each case, $100, and ordered to be committed to the county jail until the fine was paid. Each judgment was affirmed by the Supreme Court of Kansas; and thereby, it is contended, the defendant was denied rights, privileges, and immunities guaranteed by the Constitution of the United States.

The third case—Kansas v. Ziebold & Hagelin,—was commenced by petition filed in one of the courts of the State. The relief sought is: (1) that the group of buildings in Atchison County, Kansas, constituting the brewery of the defendants, partners, as Ziebold & Hagelin, be adjudged a common nuisance, and the sheriff or other proper officer directed to shut up and abate the same; (2) that the defendants be enjoined from using, or permitting to be used, the said premises as a place where intoxicating liquors may be sold, bartered, or given away, or kept for barter, sale or gift, otherwise than by authority of law.

The defendants answered, denying the allegations of the petition, and averring: First. That said buildings were erected by them prior to the adoption, by the people of Kansas, of the constitutional amendment prohibiting the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors for other than medicinal, scientific, and mechanical purposes, and before the passage of the prohibitory liquor statute of that State. Second. That they were erected for the purpose of manufacturing beer, and cannot be put to any other use; and, if not so used, they will be of little value. Third. That the statute under which said suit is brought is void under the Fourteenth Amendment of the Constitution of the United States.

Upon the petition and bond of the defendants the cause was removed into the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Kansas upon the ground that the suit was one arising under the Constitution of the United States. A motion to remand it to the state court was denied. The pleadings were recast so as to conform to the equity practice in the courts of the United States; and, the cause having been heard upon bill and answer, the suit was dismissed. From that decree the State prosecutes an appeal.

By a Statute of Kansas, approved March 8, 1868, it was made a misdemeanor, punishable by fine and imprisonment, for any one, directly or indirectly, to sell spirituous, vinous, fermented, or other intoxicating liquors, without having a dramshop, tavern, or grocery license. It was also enacted, among other things, that every place where intoxicating liquors were sold in violation of the statute should be taken, held and deemed to be a common nuisance; and it was required that all rooms, taverns, eating houses, bazaars, restaurants, groceries, coffee houses, cellars, or other places of public resort where intoxicating liquors were sold, in violation of law, should be abated as public nuisances. Gen. Stat. Kan. 1868, chap. 35.

But in 1880 the people of Kansas adopted a more stringent policy. On the second of November of that year, they ratified an amendment to the State Constitution, which declared that the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors should be forever prohibited in that State, except for medical, scientific and mechanical purposes.

In order to give effect to that amendment, the Legislature repealed the Act of 1868, and passed an Act approved February 19, 1881, to take effect May 1, 1881, entitled "An Act to Prohibit the Manufacture and Sale of Intoxicating Liquors, Except for Medical, Scientific, and Mechanical Purposes, and to Regulate the Manufacture and Sale Thereof for Such Excepted Purposes." Its first section provides "That any person or persons who shall manufacture, sell, or barter any spirituous, malt, vinous, fermented, or other intoxicating liquors shall be guilty of a misdemeanor; Provided, however, That such liquors may be sold for medical, scientific, and mechanical purposes as provided in this Act." The second section makes it unlawful for any person to sell or barter for either of such excepted purposes any malt, vinous, spirituous, fermented, or other intoxicating liquors without having procured a druggist's permit therefor, and preseribes the conditions upon which such permit may be granted. The third section relates to the giving by physicians of prescriptions for intoxicating liquors to be used by their patients, and the fourth, to the sale of such liquors by druggists. The fifth section forbids any person from manufacturing or assisting in the manufacture of intoxicating liquors in the State, except for medical, scientific and mechanical purposes, and makes provision for the granting of licenses to engage in the business of manufacturing liquors for such excepted purposes. The seventh section declares it to be a misdemeanor for any person not having the required permit, to sell or barter, directly or indirectly, spirituous, malt, vinous, fermented, or other intoxicating liquors; the punishment prescribed being, for the first offense, a fine of not less than $100 nor more than $500, or imprisonment in the county jail not less than twenty nor more than ninety days; for the second offense, a fine of not less than $200 nor more than $500, or imprisonment in the county jail not less than sixty days nor more than six months; and for every subsequent offense, a fine not less than $500 nor more than $1,000, or imprisonment in the county jail not less than three months nor more than one year, or both such fine and imprisonment in the discretion of the court. The eighth section provides for similar fines and punishments against persons who manufacture, or aid, assist, or abet the manufacture of any intoxicating liquors without having the required permit. The thirteenth section declares, among other things, all places where intoxicating liquors are manufactured, sold, bartered, or given away, or are kept for sale, barter, or use, in violation of the Act, to be common nuisances; and provides that upon the judgment of any court having jurisdiction finding such place to be a nuisance, the proper officer shall be directed to shut up and abate the same.

Under that statute, the prosecutions against Mugler were instituted. It contains other sections in addition to those above referred to; but as they embody merely the details of the general scheme adopted by the State for the prohibition of the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors, except for the purposes specified, it is unnecessary to set them out.

On the 7th of March, 1885, the Legislature passed an Act amendatory and supplementary to that of 1881. The thirteenth section of the former Act, being the one upon which the suit against Ziebold & Hagelin is founded, will be given in full in a subsequent part of this opinion.

The facts necessary to a clear understanding of the questions, common to these cases, are the following: Mugler and Ziebold & Hagelin were engaged in manufacturing beer at their respective establishments (constructed especially for that purpose), for several years prior to the adoption of the constitutional amendment of 1880. They continued in such business in defiance of the Statute of 1881, and without having the required permit. Nor did Mugler have a license or permit to sell beer. The single sale of which he was found guilty occurred in the State, and after May 1, 1881, that is, after the Act of February 19, 1881, took effect, and was of beer manufactured before its passage.

The buildings and machinery constituting these breweries are of little value if not used for the purpose of manufacturing beer; that is to say, if the statutes are enforced against the defendants the value of their property will be very materially diminished.

The general question in each case is, whether the foregoing Statutes of Kansas are in conflict with that clause of the Fourteenth Amendment which provides that "No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law."

That legislation by a State prohibiting the manufacture within her limits of intoxicating liquors, to be there sold or bartered for general use as a beverage, does not necessarily infringe any right, privilege, or immunity secured by the Constitution of the United States, is made clear by the decisions of this court, rendered before and since the adoption of the Fourteenth Amendment, to some of which, in view of questions to be presently considered, it will be well to refer.

In the License Cases, 46 U. S. 5 How. 504, [12: 256], the question was whether certain Statutes of Massachusetts, Rhode Island, and New Hampshire, relating to the sale of spirituous liquors, were repugnant to the Constitution of the United States. In determining that question it became necessary to inquire whether there was any conflict between the exercise by Congress of its power to regulate commerce with foreign countries, or among the several States, and the exercise by a State of what are called police powers. Although the members of the court did not fully agree as to the grounds upon which the decision should be placed, they were unanimous in holding that the statutes then under examination were not inconsistent with the Constitution of the United States, or with any Act of Congress. Chief Justice Taney said: "If any State deems the retail and internal traffic in ardent spirits injurious to its citizens, and calculated to produce idleness, vice, or debauchery, I see nothing in the Constitution of the United States to prevent it from regulating and restraining the traffic, or from prohibiting it altogether, if it thinks proper." Mr. Justice McLean, among other things, said: "A State regulates its domestic commerce, contracts, the transmission of estates, real and personal, and acts upon internal matters which relate to its moral and political welfare. Over these subjects the Federal Government has no power. * * * The acknowledged police power of a State extends often to the destruction of property. A nuisance may be abated. Everything prejudicial to the health or morals of a city may be removed." Mr. Justice Woodbury observed: "How can they (the States) be sovereign within their respective spheres, without power to regulate all their internal commerce, as well as police, and direct how, when and where it shall be conducted in articles intimately connected either with public morals or public safety or public prosperity?" Mr. Justice Grier, in still more emphatic language, said: "The true question presented by these cases, and one which I am not disposed to evade, is whether the States have a right to prohibit the sale and consumption of an article of commerce which they believe to be pernicious in its effects, and the cause of disease, pauperism, and crime. * * * Without attempting to define what are the peculiar subjects or limits of this power, it may safely be affirmed, that every law for the restraint or punishment of crime, for the preservation of the public peace, health and morals must come within this category. * * * It is not necessary, for the sake of justifying the state legislation now under consideration, to array the appalling statistics of misery, pauperism and crime which have their origin in the use or abuse of ardent spirits. The police power, which is exclusively in the States, is alone competent to the correction of these great evils; and all measures of restraint or prohibition necessary to effect the purpose are within the scope of that authority."

In Bartemeyer v. Iowa, 85 U. S. 18 Wall. 129 [21: 929], it was said that prior to the adoption of the Fourteenth Amendment, state enactments, regulating or prohibiting the traffic of intoxicating liquors, raised no question under the Constitution of the United States; and that such legislation was left to the discretion of the respective States, subject to no other limitations than those imposed by their own Constitutions, or by the general principles supposed to limit all legislative power. Referring to the contention that the right to sell intoxicating liquors was secured by the Fourteenth Amendment, the court said that "So far as such a right exists it is not one of the rights growing out of citizenship of the United States." In Boston Beer Co. v. Massachusetts, 97 U. S. 33 [24:992], it was said, that "As a measure of police regulation, looking to the preservation of public morals, a state law prohibiting the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors is not repugnant to any clause of the Constitution of the United States." Finally, in Foster v. Kansas, 112 U. S. 206 [28:697], the court said that the question as to the constitutional power of a State to prohibit the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors was no longer an open one in this court. These cases rest upon the acknowledged right of the States of the Union to control their purely internal affairs, and, in so doing, to protect the health, morals, and safety of their people by regulations that do not interfere with the execution of the powers of the General Government, or violate rights secured by the Constitution of the United States. The power to establish such regulations, as was said in Gibbons v. Ogden, 22 U. S. 9 Wheat. 203 [6:71], reaches everything within the territory of a State not surrendered to the National Government.

It is, however, contended, that, although the State may prohibit the manufacture of intoxicating liquors for sale or barter within her limits, for general use as a beverage, "no convention or Legislature has the right, under our form of government, to prohibit any citizen from manufacturing for his own use, or for export, or storage, any article of food or drink not endangering or affecting the rights of others." The argument made in support of the first branch of this proposition, briefly stated, is that in the implied compact between the State and the citizen certain rights are reserved by the latter, which are guaranteed by the constitutional provision protecting persons against being deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law, and with which the State cannot interfere; that among those rights is that of manufacturing for one's use either food or drink; and that while, according to the doctrines of the Commune, the State may control the tastes, appetites, habits, dress, food, and drink of the people, our system of government, based upon the individuality and intelligence of the citizen, does not claim to control him, except as to his conduct to others, leaving him the sole judge as to all that only affects himself.

It will be observed that the proposition, and the argument made in support of it, equally concede that the right to manufacture drink for one's personal use is subject to the condition that such manufacture does not endanger or affect the rights of others. If such manufacture does prejudicially affect the rights and interests of the community, it follows, from the very premises stated, that society has the power to protect itself, by legislation, against the injurious consequences of that business. As was said in Munn v. Illinois, 94 U. S. 124 [24: 83], while power does not exist with the whole people to control rights that are purely and exclusively private, government may require "each citizen to so conduct himself, and so use his own property, as not unnecessarily to injure another."

But by whom, or by what authority, is it to be determined whether the manufacture of particular articles of drink, either for general use or for the personal use of the maker, will injuriously affect the public? Power to determine such questions, so as to bind all, must exist somewhere; else society will be at the mercy of the few, who, regarding only their own appetites or passions, may be willing to imperil the peace and security of the many, provided only they are permitted to do as they please. Under our system that power is lodged with the legislative branch of the government. It belongs to that department to exert what are known as the police powers of the State, and to determine, primarily, what measures are appropriate or needful for the protection of the public morals, the public health, or the public safety.

It does not at all follow that every statute enacted ostensibly for the promotion of these ends is to be accepted as a legitimate exertion of the police powers of the State. There are, of necessity, limits beyond which legislation cannot rightfully go. While every possible presumption is to be indulged in favor of the validity of a statute, Sinking Fund Cases, 99 U. S. 718 [25: 501], the courts must obey the Constitution rather than the law-making department of government, and must, upon their own responsibility, determine whether, in any particular case, these limits have been passed. "To what purpose," it was said in Marbury v. Madison, 5 U. S. 1 Cranch, 137, 167 [2: 60, 70], "are powers limited, and to what purpose is that limitation committed to writing, if these limits may, at any time, be passed by those intended to be restrained? The distinction between a government with limited and unlimited powers is abolished, if those limits do not confine the persons on whom they are imposed, and if acts prohibited and acts allowed are of equal obligation." The courts are not bound by mere forms, nor are they to be misled by mere pretenses. They are at liberty—indeed, are under a solemn duty—to look at the substance of things, whenever they enter upon the inquiry whether the Legislature has transcended the limits of its authority. If, therefore, a statute purporting to have been enacted to protect the public health, the public morals, or the public safety, has no real or substantial relation to those objects, or is a palpable invasion of rights secured by the fundamental law, it is the duty of the courts to so adjudge, and thereby give effect to the Constitution.

Keeping in view these principles, as governing the relations of the judicial and legislative departments of government with each other, it is difficult to perceive any ground for the judiciary to declare that the prohibition by Kansas of the manufacture or sale, within her limits, of intoxicating liquors for general use there as a beverage, is not fairly adapted to the end of protecting the community against the evils which confessedly result from the excessive use of ardent spirits. There is no justification for holding that the State, under the guise merely of police regulations, is here aiming to deprive the citizen of his constitutional rights; for we cannot shut out of view the fact, within the knowledge of all, that the public health, the public morals, and the public safety, may be endangered by the general use of intoxicating drinks; nor the fact, established by statistics accessible to everyone, that the idleness, disorder, pauperism, and crime existing in the country are, in some degree at least, traceable to this evil. If, therefore, a State deems the absolute prohibition of the manufacture and sale, within her limits, of intoxicating liquors for other than medical, scientific, and manufacturing purposes, to be necessary to the peace and security of society, the courts cannot, without usurping legislative functions, override the will of the people as thus expressed by their chosen representatives. They have nothing to do with the mere policy of legislation. Indeed, it is a fundamental principle in our institutions, indispensable to the preservation of public liberty, that one of the separate departments of government shall not usurp powers committed by the Constitution to another department. And so, if, in the judgment of the Legislature, the manufacture of intoxicating liquors for the maker's own use, as a beverage, would tend to cripple, if it did not defeat, the effort to guard the community against the evils attending the excessive use of such liquors, it is not for the courts, upon their views as to what is best and safest for the community, to disregard the legislative determination of that question. So far from such a regulation having no relation to the general end sought to be accomplished, the entire scheme of prohibition, as embodied in the Constitution and laws of Kansas, might fail, if the right of each citizen to manufacture intoxicating liquors for his own use as a beverage were recognized. Such a right does not inhere in citizenship. Nor can it be said that government interferes with or impairs anyone's constitutional rights of liberty or of property, when it determines that the manufacture and sale of intoxicating drinks, for general or individual use, as a beverage, are, or may become, hurtful to society, and constitute, therefore, a business in which no one may lawfully engage. Those rights are best secured, in our government, by the observance, upon the part of all, of such regulations as are established by competent authority to promote the common good. No one may rightfully do that which the law-making power, upon reasonable grounds, delares to be prejudicial to the general welfare.

This conclusion is unavoidable, unless the Fourteenth Amendment of the Constitution takes from the States of the Union those powers of police that were reserved at the time the original Constitution was adopted. But this court has declared, upon full consideration, in Barbier v. Connolly, 113 U. S. 31 [28: 924] that the Fourteenth Amendment had no such effect. After observing, among other things, that that amendment forbade the arbitrary deprivation of life or liberty, and the arbitrary spoliation of property, and secured equal protection to all under like circumstances, in respect as well to their personal and civil rights as to their acquisition and enjoyment of property, the court said: "But neither the amendment—broad and comprehensive as it is—nor any other amendment was designed to interfere with the power of the State, sometimes termed its police power, to prescribe regulations to promote the health, peace, morals, education, and good order of the people, and to legislate so as to increase the industries of the State, develop its resources, and add to its wealth and prosperity."

Undoubtedly the State, when providing, by legislation, for the protection of the public health, the public morals, or the public safety, is subject to the paramount authority of the Constitution of the United States, and may not violate rights secured or guaranteed by that instrument, or interfere with the execution of the powers confided to the General Government. Henderson v. Mayor of N. Y. 92 U. S. 259 [23: 543]; Hannibal & St. J. R. R. Co. v. Husen, 95 U. S. 465 [24:527]; New Orleans Gas Light Co. v. Louisana Light Co. 115 U. S. 650 [29: 516]; Walling v. Michigan, 116 U. S. 446 [29: 691]; Yick Wo. v. Hopkins, 118 U. S. 356 [30: 220]; Morgan's Steamship Co. v. Louisana Board of Health, Id. 455 [30: 287].

Upon this ground—if we do not misapprehend the position of defendants—it is contended that, as the primary and principal use of beer is as a beverage; as their respective breweries were erected when it was lawful to engage in the manufacture of beer for every purpose; as such establishments will become of no value as property, or, at least, will be materially diminished in value, if not employed in the manufacture of beer for every purpose; the prohibition upon their being so employed is, in effect, a taking of property for public use without compensation, and depriving the citizen of his property without due process of law. In other words, although the State, in the exercise of her police powers, may lawfully prohibit the manufacture and sale, within her limits, of intoxicating liquors to be used as a beverage, legislation having that object in view cannot be enforced against those who, at the time, happen to own property, the chief value of which consists in its fitness for such manufacturing purposes, unless compensation is first made for the diminution in the value of their property, resulting from such prohibitory enactments.

This interpretation of the Fourteenth Amendment is inadmissible. It cannot be supposed that the States intended, by adopting that amendment, to impose restraints upon the exercise of their powers for the protection of the safety, health, or morals of the community. In respect to contracts, the obligations of which are protected against hostile state legislation, this court in Butchers Union S. H. & L. S. L. Co. v. Cresent City L. S. Co. 111 U. S. 751 [28: 587], said that the State could not, by any contract, limit the exercise of her power to the prejudice of the public health and the public morals. So, in Stone v. Mississippi, 101 U. S. 816 [25: 1079], where the Constitution was invoked against the repeal by the State of a charter, granted to a private corporation, to conduct a lottery, and for which that corporation paid to the State a valuable consideration in money, the court said: "No Legislature can bargain away the public health, or the public morals. The people themselves cannot do it, much less their servants. * * * Government is organized with a view to their preservation, and cannot devest itself of the power to provide for them."

Again, in New Orleans Gas Light Co. v. Louisana Light Co. 115 U. S. 650, 672 [29: 516, 524]: "The constitutional prohibition upon state laws impairing the obligation of contracts does not restrict the power of the State to protect the public health, the public morals, or the public safety, as the one or the other may be involved in the execution of such contracts. Rights and privileges arising from contracts with a State are subject to regulations for the protection of the public health, the public morals, and the public safety, in the same sense, and to the same extent, as are all contracts and all property, whether owned by natural persons or corporations."

The principle that no person shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law, was embodied, in substance, in the Constitutions of nearly all, if not all, of the States at the time of the adoption of the Fourteenth Amendment; and it has never been regarded as incompatible with the principle,—equally vital, because essential to the peace and safety of society,—that all property in this country is held under the implied obligation that the owner's use of it shall not be injurious to the community.

Boston Beer Co. v. Massachusetts, 97 U. S. 32 [24: 991]; Commonwealth v. Alger, 7 Cush. 53. An illustration of this doctrine is afforded by Patterson v. Kentucky, 97 U. S. 501 [24: 1115]. The question there was as to the validity of a Statute of Kentucky, enacted in 1874, imposing a penalty upon anyone selling or offering for sale oils and fluids, the product of coal, petroleum, or other bituminous substances, which would burn or ignite at a temperature below 130° Fahrenheit. Patterson, having sold within that Commonwealth a certain oil, for which letters patent were issued in 1867, but which did not come up to the standard required by said statute, and having been indicted therefor, disputed the State's authority to prevent or obstruct the exercise of that right. This court upheld the legislation of Kentucky, upon the ground that while the State could not impair the exclusive right of the patentee, or of his assignee, in the discovery described in the letters patent, the tangible property, the fruit of the discovery, was not beyond control in the exercise of her police powers. It was said: "By the settled doctrines of this court the police power extends, at least, to the protection of the lives, the health, and the property of the community against the injurious exercise, by any citizen, of his own rights. State legislation, strictly and legitimately for police purposes, does not, in the sense of the Constitution, necessarily intrench upon any authority which has been confided, expressly or by implication, to the National Government. The Kentucky Statute under examination manifestly belongs to that class of legislation. It is, in the best sense, a mere police regulation, deemed essential to the protection of the lives and property of citizens." Referring to the numerous decisions of this court guarding the power of Congress to regulate commerce against encroachment, under the guise of state regulations, established for the purpose and with the effect of destroying or impairing rights secured by the Constitution, it was further said: "It has, nevertheless, with marked distinctness and uniformity, recognized the necessity, growing out of the fundamental conditions of civil society, of upholding state police regulations which were enacted in good faith, and had appropriate and direct connection with that protection to life, health, and property which each State owes to her citizens." See also U. S. v. Dewitt, 76 U. S. 9 Wall. 41 [19: 593]; License Tax Cases, 72 U. S. 5 Wall. 462 [18: 497]; Pervear v. Commonwealth, Id. 475 [18: 608].

Another decision, very much in point upon this branch of the case, is Northwestern Fertilizing Co. v. Hyde Park, 97 U. S. 659, 667 [24: 1036, 1038], also decided after the adoption of the Fourteenth Amendment. The court there sustained the validity of an ordinance of the Village of Hyde Park, in Cook County, Illinois, passed under legislative authority, forbidding any person from transporting through that village offal or other offensive or unwholesome matter, or from maintaining or carrying on an offensive or unwholesome business or establishment within its limits. The fertilizing company had, at large expense, and under authority expressly conferred by its charter, located its works at a particular point in the county. Besides, the charter of the village, at that time, provided that it should not interfere with parties engaged in transporting animal matter from Chicago, or from manufacturing it into a fertilizer or other chemical product. The enforcement of the ordinance in question operated to destroy the business of the company, and seriously to impair the value of its property. As, however, its business had become a nuisance to the community in which it was conducted, producing discomfort, and often sickness, among large masses of people, the court maintained the authority of the village, acting under legislative sanction, to protect the public health against such nuisance. It said: "We cannot doubt that the police power of the State was applicable and adequate to give an effectual remedy. That power belonged to the States when the Federal Constitution was adopted. They did not surrender it, and they all have it now. It extends to the entire property and business within their local jurisdiction. Both are subject to it in all proper cases. It rests upon the fundamental principle that everyone shall so use his own as not to wrong and injure another. To regulate and abate nuisances is one of its ordinary functions."

It is supposed by the defendants that the doctrine for which they contend is sustained by Pumpelly v. Green Bay Co. 80 U. S. 13 Wall. 168 [20:557]. But in that view we do not concur. That was an action for the recovery of damages for the overflowing of the plaintiff's land by water, resulting from the construction of a dam across a river. The defense was that the dam constituted a part of the system adopted by the State for improving the navigation of Fox and Wisconsin Rivers; and it was contended that as the damages of which the plaintiff complained were only the result of the improvement, under legislative sanction, of a navigable stream, he was not entitled to compensation from the State or its agents. The case, therefore, involved the question whether the overflowing of the plaintiff's land, to such an extent that it became practically unfit to be used, was a taking of property, within the meaning of the Constitution of Wisconsin, providing that "The property of no person shall be taken for public use without just compensation therefor." This court said it would be a very curious and unsatisfactory result, were it held that, "If the government refrains from the absolute conversion of real property to the uses of the public, it can destroy its value entirely, can inflict irreparable and permanent injury to any extent, can, in effect, subject it to total destruction, without making any compensation, because, in the narrowest sense of that word, it is not taken for the public use. Such a construction would pervert the constitutional provision into a restriction upon the rights of the citizen, as those rights stood at the common law, instead of the government, and make it an authority for the invasion of private rights under the pretext of the public good, which had no warrant in the laws or practices of our ancestors."

These principles have no application to the case under consideration. The question in Pumpelly v. Green Bay Co. arose under the State's power of eminent domain; while the question now before us arises under what are, strictly, the police powers of the State, exerted for the protection of the health, morals, and safety of the people. That case, as this court said in Transportation Co. v. Chicago, 99 U. S. 642 [25:338] was an extreme qualification of the doctrine, universally held, that "acts done in the proper exercise of governmental powers, and not directly encroaching upon private property, though these consequences may impair its use," do not constitute a taking within the meaning of the constitutional provision, or entitle the owner of such property to compensation from the State or its agents, or give him any right of action. It was a case in which there was a "permanent flooding of private property," a "physical invasion of the real estate of the private owner, and a practical ouster of his possession." His property was, in effect, required to be devoted to the use of the public, and, consequently, he was entitled to compensation.

As already stated, the present case must be governed by principles that do not involve the power of eminent domain, in the exercise of which property may not be taken for public use without compensation. A prohibition simply upon the use of property for purposes that are declared, by valid legislation, to be injurious to the health, morals, or safety of the community, cannot, in any just sense, be deemed a taking or an appropriation of property for the public benefit. Such legislation does not disturb the owner in the control or use of his property for lawful purposes, nor restrict his right to dispose of it, but is only a declaration by the State that its use by anyone, for certain forbidden purposes, is prejudicial to the public interests. Nor can legislation of that character come within the Fourteenth Amendment, in any case, unless it is apparent that its real object is not to protect the community, or to promote the general well being, but, under the guise of police regulation, to deprive the owner of his liberty and property, without due process of law. The power which the States have of prohibiting such use by individuals of their property as will be prejudicial to the health, the morals, or the safety of the public, is not—and, consistently with the existence and safety of organized society, cannot be—burdened with the condition that the State must compensate such individual owners for pecuniary losses they may sustain, by reason of their not being permitted, by a noxious use of their property, to inflict injury upon the community. The exercise of the police power by the destruction of property which is itself a public nuisance, or the prohibition of its use in a particular way, whereby its value becomes depreciated, is very different from taking property for public use, or from depriving a person of his property without due process of law. In the one case, a nuisance only is abated; in the other, unoffending property is taken away from an innocent owner.

It is true that when the defendants in these cases purchased or erected their breweries, the laws of the State did not forbid the manufacture of intoxicating liquors. But the State did not thereby give any assurance, or come under an obligation, that its legislation upon that subject would remain unchanged. Indeed, as was said in Stone v. Mississippi, 101 U. S. 814 [25:1079] the supervision of the public health and the public morals is a governmental power, "continuing in its nature," and "to be dealt with as the special exigencies of the moment may require;" and that, "for this purpose, the largest legislative discretion is allowed, and the discretion cannot be parted with any more than the power itself." So in Boston Beer Co. v. Massachusetts, 97 U. S. 32 [24:991]: "If the public safety or the public morals require the discontinuance of any manufacture or traffic, the hand of the Legislature cannot be stayed from providing for its discontinuance by any incidental inconvenience which individuals or corporations may suffer."

It now remains to consider certain questions relating particularly to the thirteenth section of the Act of 1885. That section—which takes the place of section 13 of the Act of 1881—is as follows:

"Sec. 13. All places where intoxicating liquors are manufactured, sold, bartered, or given away in violation of any of the provisions of this Act, or where intoxicating liquors are kept for sale, barter or delivery in violation of this Act, are hereby declared to be common nuisances; and upon the judgment of any court having jurisdiction finding such place to be a nuisance under this section, the sheriff, his deputy, or under sheriff, or any constable of the proper county, or marshal of any city where the same is located, shall be directed to shut up and abate such place by taking possession thereof and destroying all intoxicating liquors found therein, together with all signs, screens, bars, bottles, glasses, and other property used in keeping and maintaining said nuisance; and the owner or keeper thereof shall, upon conviction, be adjudged guilty of maintaining a common nuisance, and shall be punished by a fine of not less than one hundred dollars nor more than five hundred dollars, and by imprisonment in the county jail not less than thirty days nor more than ninety days. The attorney-general, county attorney, or any citizen of the county where such nuisance exists, or is kept, or is maintained, may maintain an action in the name of the State to abate and perpetually enjoin the same. The injunction shall be granted at the commencement of the action, and no bond shall be required. Any person violating the terms of any injunction granted in such proceeding, shall be punished as for contempt, by a fine of not less than one hundred nor more than five hundred dollars, or by imprisonment in the county jail not less than thirty days nor more than six months, or by both such fine and imprisonment, in the discretion of the court."

It is contended by counsel in the case of Kansas v. Ziebold & Hagelin that the entire scheme of this section is an attempt to deprive persons who come within its provisions of their property and of their liberty without due process of law; especially, when taken in connection with that clause of section 14 (amendatory of section 21 of the Act of 1881) which provides that "In prosecutions under this Act, by indictment or otherwise, * * * it shall not be necessary in the first instance for the State to prove that the party charged did not have a permit to sell intoxicating liquors for the excepted purposes."

We are unable to perceive anything in these regulations inconsistent with the constitutional guarantees of liberty and property. The State having authority to prohibit the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors for other than medical, scientific, and mechanical purposes, we do not doubt her power to declare that any place, kept and maintained for the illegal manufacture and sale of such liquors, shall be deemed a common nuisance, and be abated, and, at the same time, to provide for the indictment and trial of the offender. One is a proceeding against the property used for forbidden purposes, while the other is for the punishment of the offender.

It is said that by the thirteenth section of the Act of 1885, the Legislature, finding a brewery within the State in actual operation, without notice, trial, or hearing, by the mere exercise of its arbitrary caprice, declares it to be a common nuisance, and then prescribes the consequences which are to follow inevitably by judicial mandate required by the statute, and involving and permitting the exercise of no judicial discretion or judgment; that the brewery being found in operation, the court is not to determine whether it is a common nuisance, but, under the command of the statute, is to find it to be one; that it is not the liquor made, or the making of it, which is thus enacted to be a common nuisance, but the place itself, including all the property used in keeping and maintaining the common nuisance; that the judge having thus signed without inquiry—and, it may be, contrary to the fact and against his own judgment—the edict of the Legislature, the court is commanded to take possession by its officers of the place and shut it up; nor is all this destruction of property, by legislative edict, to be made as a forfeiture consequent upon conviction of any offense, but merely because the Legislature so commands; and it is done by a court of equity, without any previous conviction first had, or any trial known to the law.

This, certainly, is a formidable arraignment of the legislation of Kansas, and if it were founded upon a just interpretation of her statutes, the court would have no difficulty in declaring that they could not be enforced without infringing the constitutional rights of the citizen. But those statutes have no such scope and are attended with no such results as the defendants suppose. The court is not required to give effect to a legislative "decree" or "edict," unless every enactment by the law making power of a State is to be so characterized. It is not declared that every establishment is to be deemed a common nuisance because it may have been maintained prior to the passage of the statute as a place for manufacturing intoxicating liquors. The statute is prospective in its operation, that is, it does not put the brand of a common nuisance upon any place, unless, after its passage, that place is kept and maintained for purposes declared by the Legislature to be injurious to the community. Nor is the court required to adjudge any place to be a common nuisance simply because it is charged by the State to be such. It must first find it to be of that character; that is, must ascertain, in some legal mode, whether since the statute was passed the place in question has been, or is being, so used as to make it a common nuisance.

Equally untenable is the proposition that proceedings in equity for the purposes indicated in the thirteenth section of the statute are inconsistent with due process of law. "In regard to public nuisances," Mr. Justice Story says, "the jurisdiction of courts of equity seems to be of a very ancient date, and has been distinctly traced back to the reign of Queen Elizabeth. The jurisdiction is applicable not only to public nuisances, strictly so called, but also to purprestures upon public rights and property. * * * In case of public nuisances, properly so called, an indictment lies to abate them, and to punish the offenders. But an information also lies in equity to redress the grievance by way of injunction." 2 Story, Eq. §§ 921, 922. The ground of this jurisdiction in cases of purpresture, as well as of public nuisances, is the ability of courts of equity to give a more speedy, effectual, and permanent remedy than can be had at law. They can not only prevent nuisances that are threatened, and before irreparable mischief ensues, but arrest or abate those in progress, and, by perpetual injunction, protect the public against them in the future; whereas, courts of law can only reach existing nuisances, leaving future acts to be the subject of new prosecutions or proceedings. This is a salutary jurisdiction, especially where a nuisance affects the health, morals, or safety of the community. Though not frequently exercised, the power undoubtedly exists in courts of equity thus to protect the public against injury. District Atty. v. Lynn & B. R. R. Co. 16 Gray, 245; Atty-Gen. v. New Jersey R. R. & T. Co. 3 N. J. Eq. 139; Atty-Gen. v. Tudor Ice Co. 104 Mass. 244; State v. Mobile, 5 Port. (Ala.) 279, 294; Hoole v. Atty-Gen. 22 Ala. 194; Atty-Gen. v. Hunter, 1 Dev. Eq. 13; Atty-Gen. v. Forbes, 2 Myl. & C. 123, 129, 133; Atty-Gen. v. Great Northern R. Co. 1 Drew. & S. 161; Eden, Inj. 259; Kerr, Inj. 2d ed. 168.

As to the objection that the statute makes no provision for a jury trial in cases like this one, it is sufficient to say that such a mode of trial is not required in suits in equity brought to abate a public nuisance. The statutory direction that an injunction issue at the commencement of the action is not to be construed as dispensing with such preliminary proof as is necessary to authorize an injunction pending the suit. The court is not to issue an injunction simply because one is asked, or because the charge is made that a common nuisance is maintained in violation of law. The statute leaves the court at liberty to give effect to the principle that an injunction will not be granted to restrain a nuisance, except upon clear and satisfactory evidence that one exists. Here the fact to be ascertained was, not whether a place, kept and maintained for purposes forbidden by the statute, was, per se, a nuisance—that fact being conclusively determined by the statute itself—but whether the place in question was so kept and maintained. If the proof upon that point is not full or sufficient, the court can refuse an injunction, or postpone action until the State first obtains the verdict of a jury in her favor. In this case it cannot be denied that the defendants kept and maintained a place that is within the statutory definition of a common nuisance. Their petition for the removal of the cause from the state court, and their answer to the bill, admitted every fact necessary to maintain this suit, if the statute under which it was brought was constitutional.

Touching the provision that in prosecutions, by indictment or otherwise, the State need not, in the first instance, prove that the defendant has not the permit required by the statute, we may remark that, if it has any application to a proceeding like this, it does not deprive him of the presumption that he is innocent of any violation of law. It is only a declaration that when the State has proven that the place described is kept and maintained for the manufacture or sale of intoxicating liquors—such manufacture or sale being unlawful except for specified purposes, and then only under a permit—the prosecution need not prove a negative; namely, that the defendant has not the required license or permit. If the defendant has such license or permit, he can easily produce it, and thus overthrow the prima facie case established by the State.

A portion of the argument in behalf of the defendants is to the effect that the Statutes of Kansas forbid the manufacture of intoxicating liquors to be exported, or to be carried to other States and, upon that ground, are repugnant to the clause of the Constitution of the United States, giving Congress power to regulate commerce with foreign Nations and among the several States. We need only say, upon this point, that there is no intimation in the record that the beer which the respective defendants manufactured was intended to be carried out of the State or to foreign countries. And, without expressing an opinion as to whether such facts would have constituted a good defense, we observe that it will be time enough to decide a case of that character when it shall come before us.

For the reasons stated, we are of opinion that the judgments of the Supreme Court of Kansas have not denied to Mugler, the plaintiff in error, any right, privilege, or immunity secured to him by the Constitution of the United States, and its judgment, in each case, is accordingly, affirmed. We are, also, of opinion that the Circuit of the United States erred in dismissing the bill of the State against Ziebold & Hagelin. The decree in that case is reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to enter a decree granting to the State such relief as the Act of March 7, 1885, authorizes. It is so ordered.

I dissent from the judgment in the last case, the one coming from the Circuit Court of the United States.

I agree to so much of the opinion as asserts that there is nothing in the Constitution or laws of the United States affecting the validity of any Act of Kansas prohibiting the sale of intoxicating liquors manufactured in the State, except under proper regulations for the protection of the health and morals of the people. But I am not prepared to say that the State can prohibit the manufacture of such liquors within its limits if they are intended for exportation, or forbid their sale within its limits, under like regulations, if Congress has authorized their importation, though the Act of Kansas is broad enough to include both such manufacture and sale. The right to import an article of merchandise, recognized as such by the commercial world—whether the right be given by Act of Congress or by treaty with a foreign country—would seem necessarily to carry the right to sell the article when imported. In Brown v. Maryland, 25 U. S. 12 Wheat. 447 [6: 688] Chief Justice Marshall, in delivering the opinion of this court, said as follows: "Sale is the object of importation, and is an essential ingredient of that intercourse of which importation constitutes a part. It is as essential an ingredient, as indispensable to the existence of the entire thing, then, as importation itself. It must be considered as a component part of the power to regulate commerce. Congress has a right, not only to authorize importation, but to authorize the importer to sell."

If one State can forbid the sale within its limits of an imported article, so may all the States, each selecting a different article. There would then be little uniformity of regulations with respect to articles of foreign commerce imported into different States; and the same may be also said of regulations with respect to articles of interstate commerce. And we know it was one of the objects of the formation of the Federal Constitution to secure uniformity of commercial regulations against discriminating state legislation. The construction of the commercial clause of the Constitution, upon which the License Cases in the 7th of Howard were decided, appears to me to have been substantially abandoned in later decisions. Hall v. De Cuir, 95 U. S. 485 [24: 547]; Welton v. Missouri, 91 U. S. 275 [23: 347]; Mobile County v. Kimball, 102 U. S. 691 [26: 238]; Parkersburg & O. R. Transportation Co. v. Parkersburg, 107 U. S. 691 [27: 584]; Gloucester Ferry Co. v. Pennsylvania, 114 U. S. 196 [29: 158]; Wabash, St. L. & Pac. R. Co. v. Illinois, 118 U. S. 557 [30: 244]. I make this reservation that I may not hereafter be deemed concluded by a general concurrence in the opinion of the majority.

I do not agree to what is said with reference to the case from the United States Circuit Court. That was a suit in equity brought for the abatement of the brewery owned by the defendants. It is based upon clauses in the 13th section of the Act of Kansas, which are as follows:

"All places where intoxicating liquors are manufactured, sold, bartered, or given away in violation of any of the provisions of this Act, or where intoxicating liquors are kept for sale, barter, or delivery in violation of this Act, are hereby declared to be common nuisances; and upon the judgment of any court having jurisdiction finding such place to be a nuisance under this section, the sheriff, his deputy, or under sheriff, or any constable of the proper county, or marshal of any city where the same is located, shall be directed to shut up and abate such place by taking possession thereof and destroying all intoxicating liquors found therein, together with all signs, screens, bars, bottles, glasses, and other property used in keeping and maintaining said nuisance; and the owner or keeper thereof shall, upon conviction, be adjudged guilty of maintaining a common nuisance, and shall be punished by a fine of not less than one hundred dollars nor more than five hundred dollars, and by imprisonment in the county jail not less than thirty days nor more than ninety days. The Attorney-General, county attorney, or any citizen of the county where such nuisance exists, or is kept, or is maintained, may maintain an action in the name of the State to abate and perpetually enjoin the same. The injunction shall be granted at the commencement of the action and no bond shall be required."

By a previous section all malt, vinous, and fermented liquors are classed as intoxicating liquors, and their manufacture, barter, and sale are equally prohibited. By the 13th section, as is well said by counsel, the Legislature, without notice to the owner or hearing of any kind, declares every place where such liquors are sold, bartered, or given away, or kept for sale, barter, or delivery—in this case a brewery, where beer was manufactured and sold, which, up to the passage of the Act, was a lawful industry—to be a common nuisance; and then prescribes what shall follow, upon a court having jurisdiction finding one of such places to be what the Legislature has already pronounced it. The court is not to determine whether the place is a common nuisance in fact, but is to find it to be so if it comes within the definition of the statute; and, having thus found it, the executive officers of the court are to be directed to shut up and abate the place by taking possession of it; and, as though this were not sufficient security against the continuance of the business, they are to be required to destroy all the liquor found therein, and all other property used in keeping and maintaining the nuisance. It matters not whether they are of such character as could be used in any other business, or be of value for any other purposes. No discretion is left in the judge or in the officer.

These clauses appear to me to deprive one who owns a brewery and manufactures beer for sale, like the defendants, of property without due process of law. The destruction to be ordered is not as a forfeiture upon conviction of any offense, but merely because the Legislature has so commanded. Assuming, which is not conceded, that the Legislature, in the exercise of that undefined power of the State, called its police power, may, without compensation to the owner, deprive him of the use of his brewery for the purposes for which it was constructed under the sanction of the law, and for which alone it is valuable, I cannot see upon what principle, after closing the brewery, and thus putting an end to its use in the future for manufacturing spirits, it can order the destruction of the liquor already manufactured, which it admits by its legislation may be valuable for some purposes, and allows to be sold for those purposes. Nor can I see how the protection of the health and morals of the people of the State can require the destruction of property like bottles, glasses, and other utensils, which may be used for many lawful purposes. It has heretofore been supposed to be an established principle, that where there is a power to abate a nuisance the abatement must be limited by its necessity, and no wanton or unnecessary injury can be committed to the property or rights of individuals. Thus, if the nuisance consists in the use to which a building is put, the remedy is to stop such use, not to tear down or to demolish the building itself, or to destroy property found within it. Babcock v. Buffalo, 56 N. Y. 268; Chenango Bridge Co. v. Paige, 83 N. Y. 189. The decision of the court, as it seems to me, reverses this principle.

It is plain that great wrong will often be done to manufacturers of liquors, if legislation like that embodied in this 13th section can be upheld. The Supreme Court of Kansas admits that the Legislature of the State, in destroying the values of such kinds of property, may have gone to the utmost verge of constitutional authority. In my opinion it has passed beyond that verge, and crossed the line which separates regulation from confiscation.

1. A suit by aliens, the object of which is to enjoin the Attorney-General and the Commonwealth's attorneys of the several counties, cities and towns of Virginia, from bringing any suit in the name of the Commonwealth to enforce the collection of taxes for the payment of which coupons originally attached to her bonds had been tendered, is a suit which the Circuit Court of the United States had no jurisdiction to entertain; such suit is, in law and fact, a suit by subjects of a foreign State against the State of Virginia, and within the prohibition of the Eleventh Amendment to the Constitution.

2. The orders, in such suit, of the circuit court forbidding the officers of the Commonwealth charged with the supervision and management of legal proceedings in her behalf to bring such suits in her name, and the orders of such court adjudging them in contempt for bringing such suits were void, and their imprisonment under such orders is without authority of law.

3. When a court of the United States undertakes, by its process of contempt, to punish a man for refusing to comply with an order which that court had no authority to make, the order punishing for contempt is void, and when the proceeding for contempt in such a case results in imprisonment this court will, by its writ of habeas corpus, discharge the prisoner.

4. Whether a suit is within the prohibition of the Eleventh Amendment is not always determined by reference to the nominal parties on the record, but by a consideration of the nature of the case.

5. For a breach of its contract by the State, there is no remedy by suit against the State itself; and a bill the object of which is by injunction indirectly to compel the specific performance of the contract, by forbidding all those acts and doings which constitute breaches of the contract, is a suit against the State.

6. In such a case, though the State be not nominally a party on the record, if the defendants are its officers and agents, through whom alone it can act in doing and refusing to do the things which constitute a breach of its contract, the suit is still in substance, though not in form, a suit against the State.

7. Suits are justifiable against individual defendants who, under color of the authority of unconstitutional legislation by the State, are guilty of personal trespasses and wrongs; and against officers in their official capacity, either to arrest or direct their official action by injunction or mandamus, where such suits are authorized by law, and the act to be done or omitted is purely ministerial.

PETITIONS for writs of habeas corpus. Granted, and petitioners ordered discharged.

Statement by Mr. Justice Matthews:

A writ of habeas corpus, directed to the Marshal of the United States for the Eastern District of Virginia, having heretofore been issued by this court on the application of Rufus A. Ayers, Attorney-General of the State of Virginia, the marshal has made return thereto that the petitioner, whose body he produces, was in his custody and detained by him by virtue of an order, judgment, decree and commitment of the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Virginia, a certified copy of which is attached as a part of the return; and further returned that the petitioner had not paid and refuses to pay the fine imposed upon him by said order. The order of commitment, dated at Richmond, October 8, 1887, is as follows:

"On Attachment for Contempt.

"In the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Virginia.

In Re RUFUS A. AYERS.

"This matter came on this day to be heard upon the rule heretofore issued against Rufus A. Ayers, Attorney-General of the State of Virginia, to show cause why he should not be attached for contempt in disobeying the restraining order heretofore granted in the suit of Cooper et al. v. Marye et al., on the 6th day of June, 1887, and his answer thereto.

"On consideration whereof the court is of opinion and doth order and adjudge that the said Rufus A. Ayers is guilty of contempt in his disobedience of said order, and that he do forthwith dismiss the suit of The Commonwealth v. The Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Company, instituted by him in the Circuit Court of the City of Richmond, and that for his said contempt he be fined the sum of $500, and stand committed in the custody of the marshal of this court until the same be paid and he purge himself of his contempt by dismissing said suit last herein mentioned."

A transcript of the proceedings, orders, and decrees of the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Virginia in the suit of Cooper et al. v. Marye et al., referred to in the order of commitment, is also produced, and set out in full as a part of the record in this matter. From that it appears that on June 6, 1887, James P. Cooper and others, suing on their own behalf and for all others similarly situated, being aliens, subjects of Great Britain, filed their bill of complaint in the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Virginia against Morton Marye, Auditor of the State of Virginia, Rufus A. Ayers, the Attorney-General thereof, and the treasurers of counties, cities, and towns in Virginia, and the commonwealth attorneys of counties, cities, and towns in said State, whose names they prayed they might be allowed to insert in the bill as defendants when discovered.

In that bill it is alleged that, by an Act of the General Assembly of Virginia, approved March 30, 1871, and another approved March 28, 1879, the State of Virginia had provided for the issue of a large number of bonds bearing interest coupons, which she thereby contracted should be received in payment of all taxes, debts, and demands due to her, of which large numbers, amounting to many millions of dollars, had been in fact issued; that said coupons issued under both of said Acts, are payable to bearer, and, both as a contract to pay interest and as a contract that they shall be received in payment of taxes, are negotiable instruments, free in the hands of any bona fide purchaser for value from any equity or burden whatever; that there are outstanding and overdue in the hands of the public at large more than $4,000,000 of these overdue coupons; that in pursuance of a plan subsequently conceived and adopted to destroy the marketable value of these coupons, the General Assembly of the State of Virginia, by the 15th section of an Act dated February 14, 1882, forbade all the officers of the State to pay and redeem the same according to the tenor of the contract contained therein, and, by an Act dated January 26, 1882, the collectors of taxes were forbidden to receive the same in payment of any taxes due to them; that, nevertheless, these statutes were declared by the Supreme Court of the United States to be unconstitutional and void; that thereafter the complainants, on the faith of said decision and the belief caused thereby that the said State would be utterly unable by any legislative enactment to impair the value of said coupons as a tender for taxes, had bought a large quantity of said coupons in the open money market of the City of London and elsewhere, amounting to more than $100,000 nominally, at a cost of more than $30,000; that this purchase was made for the purpose of selling said coupons to the taxpayers of Virginia, to be used by them as tenders for taxes due said State, the complainants believing that they would be able to sell said coupons to such taxpayers at a considerable advance on the price paid for them; many of which the complainants have sold to said taxpayers; that the General Assembly of Viginia, enacted another statute, dated May 12, 1887, a copy of which is set out as an exhibit to the bill, whereby, as is alleged, "The treasurer of each county, city, and town in the State is ordered to furnish to the Commonwealth's attorney thereof a list of all persons who have tendered the said State's coupons in payment of their taxes, and said Commonwealth's attorneys are ordered to institute suits by summary proceedings in the name of said State against all such persons to recover a judgment against them for the amount of said taxes so previously due by them; that the said taxpayers are thereby required to submit to a judgment against them by default or to appear in court and plead a tender of said coupons, and then prove affirmatively that the coupons tendered by them are the State's coupons and not counterfeit and spurious coupons, the burden of proving the same being placed upon the tax payer and the coupon being taken to be prima facie spurious and counterfeit."

In the bill it is further alleged "That said Act is repugnant to section 10 of article 1 of the Constitution of the United States, for the reason that, taking in connection with said Act before mentioned of January 26, 1882, it first commands the State's officers to refuse to receive those coupons which are undoubtedly her own as well as those which are spurious (and your orators charge that there are none such), and then commands her officers to bring said suits against those who have tendered said coupons of said State, as well as against those who have tendered spurious coupons; that it imposes upon the defendants heavy costs and fees, although all taxes due by them were paid by said tender, and it makes the judgment to be recovered in said suit a perpetual lien upon all the property of said taxpayer for said taxes, and for said costs and fees also, thus fixing a perpetual cloud upon the title of said taxpayer to his property."

It is further alleged in the bill "That, by another Act of the General Assembly of said State approved January 26, 1886, it is provided that upon a trial of the issue to be made up under said Act of May 12, 1887, the defendant shall produce the bond from which the coupon so tendered by him was cut, and prove that it was cut from said bond;" and that, as very few of said bonds are owned by persons residing in Virginia, the taxpayers would be utterly unable to produce said bonds as required by said Act.

It is further alleged therein "That, by another Act of said General Assembly, approved ——, 1886, it is provided that the taxpayer undertaking to prove said tender shall not be allowed to introduce expert evidence to prove the genuineness of said coupons, and all that have been issued under either of said Acts are engraved only, as said Acts provided they may be, and are not signed manually." Wherefore, it is alleged, that "Said taxpayers who cannot produce said bonds will be utterly unable to prove their coupons to be genuine upon said trial, the State thus forcing them into a lawsuit in her own courts, in which she has taken effectual precautions beforehand to make it impossible they can win, and to make it a legal certainty that they must lose when they cannot produce said bonds; that said Act is a device and trick enacted to take away from and deprive said coupons of their value as tender for taxes."

It is further alleged therein that the Supreme Court of Appeals of the State of Virginia has decided that said last named two Acts, requiring said bonds to be produced, and forbidding the use of expert testimony, are valid laws, not repugnant to the Constitution of the United States.

It is further alleged in the bill that, as the great bulk of the taxpayers of Virginia pay small sums, "If her officers are allowed to enforce said Act of May 12, 1887, against them, the profit to be derived from purchasing your orator's coupons will be too small to induce them to do so; and, indeed, it will be impossible for them to use said coupons at all, except in the very limited cases in which they can produce said bonds;" and that "your orators will not only lose the profit which they had a right to expect they would make when they purchased said coupons, but they will be unable to sell them to Virginia's taxpayers at any price, and thus their entire property in the same will be destroyed; and your orators charge and aver that, in any event, unless they are granted the injunction hereinafter prayed for, they will lose a sum greater than $2,000."

It is further charged in the bill "That the treasurer of each county, city and town in said State is about to report to each Commonwealth's attorney the name of every taxpayer who has tendered coupons, and each Commonwealth's attorney is going at once to institute the suits provided for by said Act of May 12, 1887, against persons holding coupons bought from your orators, as well as against all others; and they are informed and believe and so charge, that, in every case in which tenders of coupons have been made to the Auditor of the State, who is Morton Marye (and many have been made to him), the said Auditor, and Hon. R. A. Ayers, who is Attorney-General thereof, are about to institute the suits which said Act provides for their instituting, whereby all coupons which your orators have sold to Virginia taxpayers will be condemned as spurious, although they are all genuine coupons issued by the State of Virginia, and all her taxpayers will be intimidated and deterred from buying from your orators and all others in the future any more of said coupons."

It is further charged in an amended bill "That Acts of the General Assembly of the State of Virginia, which are repugnant to section 10 of article I of the Constitution of the United States, commanded the treasurer of each county to levy on and sell the property of each taxpayer who has tendered coupons in payment of his taxes; and said Acts also command said treasurers to return the real property of such taxpayers delinquent where no personal property can be found to be seized and sold; and your orators charge, therefore, that unless said officers are enjoined from bringing said suits hereinbefore described the treasurer of each county will proceed to execute said other unconstitutional Acts by levying on such taxpayer's property, or by returning the same delinquent where no personal property can be found, thus creating a cloud upon the title of such taxpayer's property."

The prayer of the bill is that "The said Morton Marye, Auditor of Virginia, R. A. Ayers, the Attorney-General thereof, and the treasurer and Commonwealth's attorney of each county, city, and town in the State of Virginia, may be made parties defendant hereto, and that they, their agents and attorneys, may be restrained and enjoined from bringing or commencing any suit provided for by said Act of May 12, 1887, or from doing any other act to put said statute into force and effect, and that until the hearing of a motion for said injunction a restraining order may be made to that effect," and for general relief.

The Act of May 12, 1887, set out as an exhibit to the bill, is as follows:

"An Act to Provide for the Recovery, by Motion, of Taxes and Certain Debts due the Commonwealth, for the Payment of Which Papers Purporting to be Genuine Coupons of the Commonwealth Have Been Tendered. Approved May 12, 1887.

"1. Be it enacted by the General Assembly of Virginia, That all taxes, including taxes on licenses, now due or which may hereafter become due to the Commonwealth, in payment of which any paper or instrument purporting to be a coupon detached from a bond of this State shall have been or may hereafter be tendered and not accepted as payment and not otherwise paid, may be recovered in the circuit court having jurisdiction over the county or corporation in which said taxes shall have been assessed, or if the tender was made to the auditor of public accounts in payment of taxes which he is authorized by law to receive, the said taxes may be recovered in the Circuit Court of the City of Richmond.

"2. The court shall have jurisdiction without regard to the amount of taxes claimed and though the amount be less than twenty dollars.

"3. The proceeding shall be by motion, in the name of the Commonwealth, on ten days' notice, and shall be instituted and prosecuted by the attorney for the Commonwealth or corporation in which the proceeding is, or if it be instituted by direction of the auditor of public accounts in the Circuit Court of the City of Richmond.

"4. The notice may be served in any county or corporation in the State in the mode prescribed by the first section of chapter one hundred and sixty-four of the Code (edition of eighteen hundred and seventy-three), or it may be served on any agent of the defendant in the county or corporation in which the proceeding is, and the word 'agent,' as here used, shall include any person who shall have made the tender aforesaid on behalf of the defendant, or if there be no known agent of the defendant in the said county or corporation it may be served by the publishing the same one time in some newspaper printed in the county or city where the tax was assessed, or if there be no paper printed in such county or city, then in some newspaper published in some county or city nearest to the county or city where such tax was assessed.

"5. The motion may be tried or heard by the court or jury as motions in other civil cases. If the defendant relies on a tender of coupons as payment of the taxes claimed, he shall plead the same specifically and in writing, and file with the plea the coupons averred therein to have been tendered, and the clerk shall carefully preserve them. Upon such plea filed the burden of proving the tender and the genuineness of the coupons shall be on the defendant. If the tender and the genuineness of the coupons be established, judgment shall be for the defendant on the plea of tender. In such case the clerk shall write the word 'proved,' and thereunder his name in his official character, across the face of the coupons, and transmit them, together with a certificate of the court that they have been proven in the case, to the auditor of public accounts, who shall deliver the coupons to the second auditor, receiving therefor the check of the second auditor upon the treasurer, which check he shall pay into the treasury to the credit of the proper tax account.

"6. If the defendant fails in his defense and the taxes claimed are found to be due the State, any coupon filed by him with a plea of tender (and not spurious) shall be returned to him, and there shall be judgment for the Commonwealth for the aggregate amount of the taxes due and the interest thereon from the time they became due till the date of the judgment, with interest on the said aggregate amount from the date of the judgment until payment, and costs.

"7. No antecedent lien of the Commonwealth for the taxes for which any judgment is rendered shall be deemed to be merged in the judgment or otherwise impaired by the recovery of the same, but such lien shall continue in force notwithstanding the judgment.

"8. Every such judgment shall be docketed, as prescribed by law in other cases, and the clerk thall issue execution thereon, directed to the sheriff of any county (or sergeant of any city), who shall account for the money collected thereon to the auditor of public accounts.

"9. Should coupons be tendered the officer in satisfaction of said execution, he shall note the fact of such tender upon the execution and return it to the clerk's office; and thereupon the auditor of public accounts may direct an action to be brought upon the judgment. This action shall be instituted and prosecuted in the mode herein prescribed for actions to recover judgments for taxes, and similar actions may be instituted whenever coupons are tendered in satisfaction of any judgment obtained by the Commonwealth under the provisions of this Act.

"10. The clerk of the court in which any such judgment is rendered in behalf of the Commonwealth shall, as soon as it is rendered, transmit a certified abstract thereof to the auditor of public accounts, who shall record the same in a book to be kept for that purpose.

"11. Immediately after the passage of this Act the county and city treasurers, and all other officers authorized by law to collect or receive money for taxes due the Commonwealth, including the license taxes, shall report to the Commonwealth's attorneys of their respective counties and cities, and also to the auditor of public accounts, the names of all persons assessed or liable therein for taxes due the Commonwealth who have heretofore tendered (otherwise than for identification and verification) coupons for such taxes, and which taxes remain unpaid, the amount of the taxes due, on what account, and when they become payable, and a description, as far as possible, of the coupons tendered, and when tendered; and they shall thereafter make like reports whenever and as soon as any such tender may be made. As soon as the auditor of public accounts shall receive such reports he shall credit the proper officer with the taxes named therein for which coupons were tendered.

"12. The attorneys for the Commonwealth and the attorney-general, when it is his duty under this Act to represent the Commonwealth in any case in the Circuit Court in the City of Richmond, upon such report being made to them, or whenever they are otherwise informed of any such tender having been made, shall forthwith institute and prosecute such proceedings as are hereinbefore required.

"13. In any case instituted under the provisions of this Act, in which there is a judgment for the Commonwealth, a fee of ten dollars shall be allowed the attorney for the Commonwealth, or the attorney-general, as the case may be, which fee and fees of the clerk and other officers for services rendered in the case, as well as such other costs as are allowed by law in other cases in which the Commonwealth is a party, shall be taxed in the costs against the defendant. The Commonwealth shall not be liable for any fees or costs in any proceedings under this Act.

"14. If any officer fail to perform any duty required of him by this Act he shall be fined not less than one hundred dollars nor more than five hundred dollars.

"15. This Act shall be in force from its passage."

On this bill the following order was made:

"Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Virginia.

"James P. Cooper, H. R. Beeton, F. J. Burt, N. J. Chinnery, W. M. Chinnery. F. P. Leon, and W. G. Woolston,
"Morton Marye, Auditor, R. A. Ayers, Attorney-General, the Treasurers of Counties, Cities and Towns in Virginia, and the Commonwealth Attorneys of Counties, Cities and Towns in said State, whose names complainants have leave to insert as they may be discovered.

"Upon reading the bill of the complainants, it is ordered that Morton Marye, Auditor, R. A. Ayers, Attorney-General, each and every treasurer of a county, city, or town in the State of Virginia, and each and every commonwealth attorney for a county, city, or town in said State, be restrained from bringing or commencing any suit against any person who has tendered the State of Virginia's tax-receivable coupons in payment of taxes due to said State, as provided for and directed by the Act of the Legislature of Virginia, approved May 12, 1887, described in the bill, and of which a copy is attached thereto, and that each and all of said parties, their agents and attorneys, be restrained from doing any act to put said statute into force and effect until the further order of the court.

"And it is ordered that the motion for an injunction in this case be set down for hearing at the Circuit Court of the United States at Richmond, Virginia, on the first Monday in October next; Provided, That the Attorney-General of the State of Virginia, or either of the defendants, may move the court for an earlier hearing thereof after ten days' written notice to the solicitor of the complainants; and provided further, That a copy of this bill and of this order be served on the Attorney-General of the State of Virginia within ten days after the filing thereof.

A copy of this order, together with a copy of the bill, was served on the petitioner Ayers, the Attorney-General of Virginia, on June 7, 1887.

On October 8, 1887, the following proceedings took place, viz.:

"And now, at this date, to wit: at a Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Virginia, held at Richmond, in said district, this 8th day of October A. D. 1887.

"J. P. Cooper and Others
Morton Marye, Auditor, etc., and Others. } In Equity.

"This cause came on this day to be heard upon the motion of the complainants for a preliminary injunction and was argued by counsel; upon consideration whereof it is adjudged, ordered, and decreed, for reasons stated in writing and made part of the record, that the injunction be issued as prayed in the bill and remain in force until the further order of the court.

"Hugh L. Bond,
"Circuit Judge.

"Thereupon the complainants, by counsel, called the attention of the court to the fact that the defendant, R. A. Ayers, Attorney-General of the State of Virginia, was guilty of contempt by his disobedience of restraining order issued in this cause on 6th day of June, 1887, and the said R. A. Ayers, being called upon to answer in this behalf, filed in open court his answer in writing, which answer is in the words following, to wit:

"Answer of Defendant R. A. Ayers.

"The answer of R. A. Ayers, Attorney-General of the State of Virginia, to a rule awarded against him by this honorable court.

"To the Honorable Judge of the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Virginia:

"By an order entered in the chancery cause of James P. Cooper et als. against Morton Marye and others, summoning him to show cause why he should not be fined and imprisoned for disobeying the injunction heretofore awarded in said suit, restraining him and others from instituting the suits required by an Act of the General Assembly of Virginia, entitled 'An Act to Provide for the Recovery by Motion of Taxes and Certain Debts Due the Commonwealth, for the Payment of Which Papers Purporting to be Genuine Coupons of the Commonwealth Have Been Tendered,' approved May 12, 1887, by instituting a suit against the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Co., respondent, answering, says that he admits that he instituted the suit against the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company to recover taxes due by it to the State of Virginia after he had been served with the injunction order in this case; that he instituted the said suit because he was thereunto required by the Act of the General Assembly of Virginia aforesaid, and because he believed this court had no jurisdiction whatever to award the injunction violated. Respondent disclaims any intention to treat the court with disrespect, and states that he has been actuated alone with the desire to have the law properly administered.

"R. A AYERS,
"Atty-Gen. of Virginia.

"Subscribed and sworn to before me this 8th day of October, 1887.

"M. F. PLEASANTS, Clerk."

And thereupon the order was made adjudging the petitioner guilty of contempt by his disobedience of said order, and requiring him forthwith to dismiss the suit of Commonwealth v.

Baltimore & Ohio R. R. Co., instituted by him in the Circuit Court of the City of Richmond, fining him $500 for his contempt, and directing that he stand committed in the custody of the marshal of the court until the same be paid, and to purge himself of his contempt by dismissing said suit last mentioned.

In the same case, the proceedings resulting in the commitment and imprisonment of the petitioner John Scott, are as follows:

On August 23, 1887, on affidavit, showing that John Scott, attorney for the Commonwealth for Fauquier County, Virginia, had been served with a copy of the restraining order of June 6, 1887, and that in violation thereof he had brought certain suits against parties in said county, for the recovery of taxes alleged to be due by them to the State of Virginia for the year 1886, for which they had previously tendered tax-receivable coupons, said actions being brought under the Act of the General Assembly of May 12, 1887, a rule was entered upon the said Scott to show cause, on September 23, 1887, why he should not be attached for contempt. On that day the said Scott answered the rule, justifying his action on the ground that the order which he had disobeyed was void for want of jurisdiction in the circuit court to make it. On September 24, 1887, in pursuance of leave given, the complainants filed an amendment to their bill, making Scott, as attorney for the Commonwealth for said County of Fauquier, a formal party defendant, and alleging that a judgment had been rendered against the defendant in each of the suits brought by the said Scott under the said Act, a list of which, with the amounts of the several judgments, was set out.

Thereupon, on October 8, 1887, the following order was made: "The court, therefore, doth adjudge, order, and decree that, for his contempt of this court, said John Scott do pay a fine of $10, and dismiss the cases which he has brought in the Circuit Court of Fauquier County, Virginia, in violation of the restraining order heretofore made in the cause of Cooper v. Marye, on the 6th day of June, 1887; and, further, that he enter satisfaction of the judgments heretofore obtained by him against the defendants in said causes, and that he stand committed to the custody of the marshal of this court until this order is obeyed, and the fine hereby imposed upon him is paid. And it is further ordered that the said John Scott do pay the costs of these proceedings."

Similar proceedings were had in respect to J. B. McCabe, the Commonwealth's attorney for Loudoun County, Virginia, the other petitioner. On July 11, 1887, an order was entered granting a rule against him to show cause why he should not be attached for an alleged contempt of the court in disobeying the restraining order made in the cause on June 6, 1887. Upon proof by affidavit that the said McCabe, as such attorney, had commenced proceedings under the Act of May 12, 1887, to recover taxes alleged to be due to the State of Virginia from certain parties therein named, who had previously tendered tax receivable coupons in payment thereof, he answered the rule, denying the validity of the order which he had violated; and thereupon, on October 8, 1887, the matter coming on to be heard, it was ordered and adjudged by the court "that the said J. B. McCabe is guilty of contempt in his disobedience of said order, and that he do forthwith dismiss all suits under the Act of May 12, 1887, now pending in the Circuit Court of Loudoun County. And the court doth further order and adjudge that the said J. B. McCabe, for his said contempt, be fined $100; that he be taken into the custody of the marshal of this court, and by him held until the said fine be paid, and he purge himself of the said contempt by dismissing the suits brought or prosecuted in violation of the restraining order of this court; and that he pay the costs of these proceedings."

Messrs. C. V. Meredith, W. W. Gordon, J. Randolph Tucker and Roscoe Conkling, for petitioners:

The restraining order or injunction was to proceedings in a state court, and is beyond the jurisdiction of the court, under the provisions of the Act of Congress.

Osborn v. U. S. Bank, 22 U. S. 9 Wheat. 738 (6: 204); Poindexter v. Greenhow, supra.

Mr. Justice Matthews delivered the opinion of the court:

It is established by the decisions of this court, that while "the exercise of the power of punishment for contempt of their orders, by courts of general jurisdiction, is not subject to review by writ of error or appeal to this court," yet, when "a court of the United States undertakes, by its process of contempt, to punish a man for refusing to comply with an order which that court had no authority to make, the order itself, being without jurisdiction, is void; and the order punishing for the contempt is equally void;" and that, "when the proceeding for contempt in such a case results in imprisonment, this court will, by its writ of habeas corpus, discharge the prisoner." Ex parte Fisk, 113 U. S. 713, 718 [28:1117, 1119].

In Ex parte Rowland, 104 U. S. 604 [26:861], the commissioners of a county in Alabama were, on a writ of habeas corpus, discharged by this court from imprisonment to which they had been adjudged in consequence of an alleged contempt of the Circuit Court of the United States for the Middle District of Alabama, in refusing to obey the command of a peremptory 496 writ of mandamus issued by that court requiring them to levy certain taxes. This court said, page 612 [864]: "If the command of the peremptory writ of mandamus was in all respects such as the circuit court had jurisdiction to make, the proceedings for the contempt are not reviewable here. But if the command was in whole or in part beyond the power of the court, the writ, or so much as was in excess of jurisdiction, was void, and the court had no right in law to punish for any contempt of its unauthorized requirements. Such is the settled rule of decision in this court. Ex parte Lange, 85 U. S. 18 Wall. 163 [21:872]; Ex parte Parks, 93 U. S. 18 [23:787]; Ex parte Siebold, 100 U. S. 371 [25:717]; Ex parte Virginia, 100 U. S. 339 [25:676]."

In Ex parte Bain, 121 U S. 1 [30: 849], it was held that a prisoner who had been tried, convicted, and sentenced to imprisonment, by a Circuit Court of the United States, the indictment having been amended by the district attorney, by leave of the court, after it had been returned by the grand jury, was entitled to his discharge under a writ of habeas corpus issued by this court, on the ground that the proceeding was void. The court said, page 13 [853]: "It is of no avail, under such circumstances, to say that the court still has jurisdiction of the person and of the crime; for, though it has possession of the person, and would have jurisdiction of the crime, if it were properly presented by indictment, the jurisdiction of the offense is gone, and the court has no right to proceed any further in the progress of the case, for want of an indictment."

The question in the present case, therefore, is whether the order of the circuit court of June 6, 1887, forbidding the petitioners from bringing suits under the Act of May 12, 1887, in the name and on behalf of the State of Virginia, as its attorneys, for the recovery of taxes, in payment of which the taxpayers had previously tendered tax receivable coupons, is an order which that court had power by law to make. The question really is whether the circuit court had jurisdiction to entertain the suit in which that order was made, because the sole purpose and prayer of the bill are by a final decree perpetually to enjoin the defendants from taking any steps in execution of the Act of May 12, 1887. If the court had power, upon 497 the case made in the record, to entertain the suit for that purpose, it had equal power, as a provisional remedy, to grant the restraining order, the violation of which constitutes the contempt adjudged against the petitioners.

The principal contention on the part of the petitioners is that the suit, nominally against them, is, in fact, and in law, a suit against the State of Virginia, whose officers they are, jurisdiction to entertain which is denied by the 11th Amendment to the Constitution, which declares that "The judicial power of the United States shall not be construed to extend to any suit in law or equity, commenced or prosecuted against one of the United States by citizens of another State, or by citizens or subjects of any foreign State." On the other hand, it is contended by counsel for the complainants in that cause, who have argued against the discharge of the petitioners, that the suit is not within that prohibition.

It must be regarded as the settled doctrine of this court, established by its recent decisions, "that the question whether a suit is within the prohibition of the 11th Amendment is not always determined by reference to the nominal parties on the record." Poindexter v. Greenhow, 114 U. S. 270, 287 [29: 185, 191]. This, it is true, is not in harmony with what was said by Chief Justice Marshall in Osborn v. Bank of U. S. 22 U. S. 9 Wheat. 738, 857 [6: 204, 232]. In his opinion in that case he said: "It may, we think, be laid down as a rule which admits of no exception, that, in all cases where jurisdiction depends on the party, it is the party named in the record. Consequently, the 11th Amendment, which restrains the jurisdiction granted by the Constitution over suits against States, is, of necessity, limited to those suits in which a State is a party on the record. The amendment has its full effect, if the Constitution be construed as it would have been construed had the jurisdiction of the court never been extended to suits brought against a State by the citizens of another State or by aliens." And the point as involved in that case was stated by Mr. Justice Swayne, delivering the opinion of the court in Davis v. Gray, 83 U. S. 16 Wall. 203, 220 [21: 447, 453], as follows: "In deciding who are parties to the suit the 498 court will not look beyond the record. Making a state officer a party does not make the State a party, although her law may have prompted his action and the State may stand behind him as the real party in interest. A State can be made a party only by shaping the bill expressly with that view, as where individuals or corporations are intended to be put in that relation to the case." But what was said by Chief Justice Marshall in Osborn v. Bank of U. S. supra, must he taken in connection with its immediate context, wherein he adds, page 858 [232]: "The State not being a party on the record, and the court having jurisdiction over those who are parties on the record, the true question is not one of jurisdiction, but whether, in the exercise of its jurisdiction, the court ought to make a decree against the defendants,—whether they are to be considered as having a real interest, or as being only nominal parties." This conveys the intimation, that where the defendants, who are sued as officers of the State, have not a real, but merely a nominal interest in the controversy, the State appearing to be the real defendant, and therefore an indispensable party, if the jurisdiction does not fail for want of power over the parties, it does fail, as to the nominal defendants, for want of a suitable subject matter.

This, indeed, seems to be the interpretation put upon this language by Chief Justice Marshall himself in the opinion of the court delivered by him in the case of Governor of Georgia v. Madrazo, 26 U. S. 1 Pet. 110, 128, 124 [7: 73, 79]. After quoting the paragraphs from the opinion in the case of Osborn v. Bank of U. S. above extracted, the Chief Justice mentioned the case of Georgia v. Brailsford, 2 U. S. 2 Dall. 402 [1: 433], where the action was not in the name of the State, but was brought by the Governor in its behalf, and added: "If, therefore, the State was properly considered as a party in that case, it may be considered as a party in this." He further said: "The claim upon the Governor is as a governor; he is sued, not by his name, but by his title. The demand made upon him is not made personally, but officially. The decree is pronounced, not against the person, but the officer, and appeared to have been pronounced against the successor of the original defendant, as the appeal bond was executed by a different Governor from him who filed the information. In such a case, where the Chief Magistrate of a State is sued, not by his name, but by his style of office, and the claim made upon him is entirely in his official character, we think the State itself may be considered as a party on the record. If the State is not a party, there is no party against whom a decree can be made. No person in his natural capacity is brought before the court as defendant." It was therefore held, in that case, that the State was in fact, though not in form, a party defendant to the suit, and that, consequently, the circuit court had no jurisdiction to pronounce the decree appealed from. See also Ex parte Madrazo, 32 U. S. 7 Pet. 627 [8: 808]. This view was reiterated by this court in Kentucky v. Dennison, 65 U. S. 24 How. 66, 98 [16, 717, 726], where it was said to be settled "that where the State is a party, plaintiff or defendant, the Governor represents the State, and the suit may be, in form, a suit by him as Governor in behalf of the State, where the State is plaintiff, and he must be summoned or notified as the officer representing the State, where the State is defendant." Accordingly in Cunningham v. Macon & B. R. R. Co. 109 U. S. 446 [27: 992], it was decided that in those cases where it is clearly seen upon the record that a State is an indispensable party to enable the court, according to the rules which govern its procedure, to grant the relief sought, it will refuse to take jurisdiction. The inference is that where it is manifest, upon the face of the record, that the defendants have no individual interest in the controversy, and that the relief sought against them is only in their official capacity as representatives of the State, which alone is to be affected by the judgment or decree, the question then arising, whether the suit is not substantially a suit against the State, is one of jurisdiction.

The very question was presented in the cases of New Hampshire v. Louisiana and New York v. Louisiana, 108 U. S. 76 [27: 656]. In each of those cases there was upon the face of the record nominally a controversy between two States, which, according to the terms of the Constitution, was subject to the judicial power of the United States. So far as could be determined by reference to the parties named in the record, the suits were within the jurisdiction of this court; but, on an examination of the cases as stated in the pleadings, it appeared that the State, which was plaintiff, was suing, not for its own use and interest, but for the use and on behalf of certain individual citizens thereof who had transferred their claims to the State for the purposes of suit. It was accordingly unanimously held by this court, that it would look behind and through the nominal parties on the record, to ascertain who were the real parties to the suit. The Chief Justice, speaking for the court in that case, made a review of the circumstances which led to the adoption of the 11th Amendment, and, in concluding his opinion, said: "The evident purpose of the Amendment, so promptly proposed and finally adopted, was to prohibit all suits against a State by or for citizens of other States, or aliens, without the consent of the States to be sued; and, in our opinion, one State cannot create a controversy with another State, within the meaning of that term as used in the judicial clauses of the Constitution, by assuming the prosecution of debts owing by the other State to its citizens. Such being the case, we are satisfied that we are prohibited, both by the letter and the spirit of the Constitution, from entertaining these suits, and the bill in each case is dismissed."

The converse of that case is to be found in Hagood v. Southern, 117 U. S. 52 [29: 805]. There, the State of South Carolina, which was the party in interest, was not nominally a defendant. The nominal defendants were the Treasurer of the State of South Carolina, its Comptroller General, and the treasurers of its various counties and their successors in office. The object of the bills was to obtain on behalf of the complainants, by judicial process, the redemption by the State of certain scrip of which they were holders, according to the terms of a statute in pursuance of which it was issued, by the levy, collection, and appropriation of a special tax pledged to that purpose, as they claimed, by an irrepealable law constituting a contract protected from violation by the Constitution of the United States. The decrees of the circuit court granting the relief were reversed, and the cause remanded with instructions to dismiss the bills, on the ground that the suits, though nominally against the officers of the State, were really against the State itself. In its opinion this court said, page 67 [810]: "These suits are accurately described as bills for the specific performance of a contract between the complainants and the State of South Carolina, who are the only parties to it. But to these bills the State is not in name made a party defendant, though leave is given to it to become such if it chooses; and except with with that consent it could not be brought before the court and be made to appear and defend. And yet it is the actual party to the alleged contract, the performance of which is decreed, the one required to perform the decree, and the only party by whom it can be performed. Though not nominally a party to the record, it is the real and only party in interest, the nominal defendants being the officers and agents of the State, having no personal interest in the subject matter of the suit, and defending only as representing the State. And the things required by the decrees to be done and performed by them are the very things which, when done and performed, constitute a performance of the alleged contract by the State. The State is not only the real party to the controversy, but the real party against which relief is sought by the suit, and the suit is, therefore, substantially within the prohibition of the Eleventh Amendment to the Constitution of the United States."

The conclusions in the case of Hagood v. Southern were justified by what had previously been decided by this court in the cases of Louisiana v. Jumel and Elliott v. Wiltz, 107 U. S. 711 [27:448]. Those cases had for their object: one, by injunction, to restrain the officers of the State from executing the provisions of the Act of the General Assembly alleged to be in violation of the contract rights of the plaintiffs; and the other, by mandamus, to require the appropriation of money from the treasury of the State in accordance with the contract. This relief, it was decided, was not within the competency of the judicial power. The Chief Justice said, on that point, page 727 [453]: "The remedy sought, in order to be complete, would require the court to assume all the executive authority of the State, so far as it 492 related to the enforcement of this law, and to supervise the conduct of all persons charged with any official duty in respect to the levy, collection, and disbursement of the tax in question until the bonds, principal and interest, were paid in full; and that, too, in a proceeding in which the State, as a State, was not and could not be made a party. It needs no argument to show that the political power cannot be thus ousted of its jurisdiction and the judiciary set in its place. When a State submits itself, without reservation, to the jurisdiction of a court in a particular case, that jurisdiction may be used to give full effect to what the State has, by its act of submission, allowed to be done; and if the law permits coercion of the public officers to enforce any judgment that may be rendered, then such coercion may be employed for that purpose. But this is very far from authorizing the court, when a State cannot be sued, to set up its jurisdiction over the officers in charge of the public moneys, so as to control them as against the political power, in their administration of the finances of the State."

It is, therefore, not conclusive of the principal question in this case, that the State of Virginia is not named as a party defendant. Whether it is the actual party, in the sense of the prohibition of the Constitution, must be determined by a consideration of the nature of the case as presented on the whole record.

The substantial averments of the bill are (1) that the complainants were the owners of $100,000 worth of tax receivable coupons of Virginia, for which they had paid over $30,000; (2) that they have sold $50,000 of that amount for $15,000 or more to taxpayers of Virginia, who have tendered the same to the proper state officials in payment of their taxes, but that said officers have refused to receive the same; (3) that if the officers of the State are permitted to enforce the Act of May 12, 1887, the complainants will be unable to sell the remaining $50,000 of their coupons to the taxpayers of that State at any price, and thus their entire property in the same will be destroyed; (4) that the Act of May 12, 1887, is unconstitutional and void, because it impairs the obligation of 493 the contract of the State of Virginia by which it agreed to receive coupons cut from its bonds in payment of debts, demands, and taxes due to it.

The particulars in which this contract is alleged to be violated by the provisions of that Act are: first, that, in disregard of tenders of tax-receivable coupons made by taxpayers in payment of taxes, the Act of the General Assembly peremptorily requires actions at law to be brought in the name of the State of Virginia against all such taxpayers as are delinquent; second, because in the trial of such actions it is required that the defendant shall not only prove the fact of tender, but the genuineness of the coupons tendered; third, that as part of that proof he is required to produce the bond itself from which such coupon is said to have been cut; and, fourth, that he is not permitted to introduce expert testimony to prove the genuineness of the coupons tendered. The prayer of the bill is that the Attorney-General of the State of Virginia, and the Commonwealth's attorneys for the counties, be restrained by injunction from commencing and prosecuting any suits under the Act of May 12, 1887, for the recovery of taxes against parties alleged to be delinquent, but who in fact have tendered tax-receivable coupons in payment of taxes due.

It is to be noted that there is no direct averment in the original of amended bills that the coupons alleged to have been tendered in payment of taxes by those taxpayers against whom the defendants threatened to bring suits under the Act of May 12, 1887, were purchased from the complainants, although it incidentally appears otherwise upon the record that some of them may have been. The injunction, however, prayed for is to prevent the bringing of any suits under that Act against taxpayers who have tendered coupons, whether the coupons were purchased from the complainants or not.

It is also to be observed that the only personal act on the part of the petitioners sought to be restrained by the original order of June 6, 1887, in pursuance of the prayer of the bill, is the bringing of any suit under the Act of May 12, 1887, against any person who had tendered tax-receivable coupons in payment of taxes due to the State of Virginia. Any such suit must, 494 by the statute, be brought in the name of the State, and for its use.

It is immaterial, in our opinion, to consider the matters which are alleged in respect to the course and conduct of such a suit after its institution, by reason of the provisions contained in other Acts of the General Assembly of the State restricting the mode of proof of the genuineness of the coupons tendered. What is required by the Act of May 12, 1887, is that "If the defendant relies on a tender of coupons as payment of the taxes claimed, he shall plead the same specifically and in writing, and file with the plea the coupons averred therein to have been tendered; and the clerk shall carefully preserve them. Upon such plea filed the burden of proving the tender and the genuineness of the coupons shall be on the defendant. If the tender and the genuineness of the coupons be established, judgment shall be for the defendant on the plea of tender. In such case the clerk shall write the word 'proved,' and thereunder his name in his official character, across the face of the coupons, and transmit them, together with a certificate of the court that they have been proven in the case, to the auditor of public accounts, who shall deliver the coupons to the second auditor, receiving therefor the check of the second auditor upon the treasurer, which check he shall pay into the treasury to the credit of the proper tax account."

If a suit may be rightfully brought at all by the State to recover a judgment for taxes, in such a case, certainly there is nothing in these provisions that violates any legal or contract right of the party sued. If he defends the action on the ground of a lawful tender of payment, he must, of course, plead the tender, and may rightfully be required to bring into court the tender alleged to have been made. Under the issue upon this plea, the burden is upon the defendant of proving the truth of its allegations. What shall be the amount and kind of proof necessary to establish the defense involves questions of law which can only be raised and decided in the course of the trial. Their determination is for the court where the trial is to be had. If, in pursuance of other Acts of the General Assembly, the contract rights of the defendant, as a taxpayer having tendered tax-receivable coupons, are denied to 495 him in that trial, by reason of requirements in regard to the nature and quantity of proof as to the genuineness of the coupons, the errors of law thus committed can only be remedied, according to the common course of judicial proceedings, by a writ of error, which, as it would present a federal question, might ultimately be sued out in this court. But it is not to be assumed in advance, either that such questions will arise or that, if they arise, they will be erroneously decided. The question, therefore, is narrowed to the single inquiry of the equitable right of the complainants to enjoin the petitioners against bringing any such suits at all.

It seems to be supposed in argument, that the right of taxpayers in Virginia, who have tendered tax receivable coupons in payment of their taxes to the proper collecting officer, to be forever thereafter free from suit by the State to recover judgment for such taxes, rests upon the proposition that such a tender is in law a payment of the taxes, so as to extinguish all claim for them on the part of the State. This proposition, indeed, is said to be justified by the authority of certain language in the opinion of this court in the case of Poindexter v. Greenhow, 114 U. S. 270 [29: 185]. In that case the effect of a tender in payment of taxes upon the subsequent act of the collector in seizing the personal property of the taxpayer was considered and decided; but there is nothing in the opinion which countenances the idea that such a tender was a payment of the taxes, so as to extinguish all subsequent claim of the State therefor. Its effect was precisely defined in the following statement, page 299 [195]: "His tender, as we have already seen, was equivalent to payment, so far as concerns the legality of all subsequent steps by the collector to enforce payment by distraint of his property." There is nothing in the opinion to indicate that the party making the tender was relieved from the operation of the rule of law, making it necessary to keep the tender good, or that a subsequent action at law for the recovery of the taxes would be unlawful—reserving, of course, in such a case, the admitted right of the defendant to plead the fact of his tender and bring it into court, in pursuance of the usual practice in such cases, as a defense.

It follows, therefore, in the present case, that the personal act of the petitioners sought to be restrained by the order of the circuit court, reduced to the mere bringing of an action in the name of and for the State against taxpayers, who, although they may have tendered tax-receivable coupons, are charged as delinquents, cannot be alleged against them as an individual act in violation of any legal or contract rights of such taxpayers.

Much more difficult is it to conceive that it constitutes a grievance of which the complainants in the principal suit have any legal right to complain. No suits against the complainants themselves are apprehended; and their pecuniary interest in the actions threatened against taxpayers who have made tenders of tax-receivable coupons purchased from them, with their guaranty against loss in consequence thereof, is collateral and remote. The bringing of such actions is no breach of any contract subsisting between the complainants and the State of Virginia. All rights under the contract contained in the coupons they parted with when they transferred them to taxpayers. If the complainants have agreed in that transfer that they shall be received by the State in payment of taxes, that is a contract between the complainants and the taxpayer, their assignee, to which the State is not a party. It is one the complainants have voluntarily entered into, and for which the State cannot be held responsible.

In that aspect, the case does not differ in principle from Marye v. Parsons, 114 U. S. 325 [29: 205]. The consequential losses in the diminution of the market value of the coupons which they still hold, and the liability of the complainants to make good their warranty to taxpayers to whom they have transferred the others, are not direct and legal consequences of any breach of the contract made with the State of Virginia by which the coupons are made receivable in payment of taxes. As such damage could not be recovered in a direct action upon the contract, if the State were suable at law, so neither can it be made the foundation of any preventive relief by injunction.

These considerations, however, are adverted to in this connection, not so much for the purpose of showing that the substance of the bill 497 presents a case the subject-matter of which is not within the jurisdiction of the court as to show that it does not allege any grounds of equitable relief against the individual defendants for any personal wrong committed or threatened by them. It does not charge against them in their individual character anything done or threatened which constitutes, in contemplation of law, a violation of personal or property rights, or a breach of contract to which they are parties.

The relief sought is against the defendants, not in their individual, but in their representative capacity as officers of the State of Virginia. The acts sought to be restrained are the bringing of suits by the State of Virginia in its own name and for its own use. If the State had been made a defendant to this bill by name, charged according to the allegations it now contains—supposing that such a suit could be maintained—it would have been subjected to the jurisdiction of the court by process served upon its Governor and Attorney-General, according to the precedents in such cases. New Jersey v. New York, 30 U. S. 5 Pet. 284, 288, 290 [8: 127, 128, 129]; Kentucky v. Dennison, 65 U. S. 24 How. 66, 96, 97 [16: 717, 725]; Rule 5 of 1884, 108 U. S. 574 [See Bk. 20: 901]. If a decree could have been rendered enjoining the State from bringing suits against its taxpayers, it would have operated upon the State only through the officers who by law were required to represent it in bringing such suits, viz.: the present defendants, its Attorney-General, and the Commonwealth's attorneys for the several counties. For a breach of such an injunction, these officers would be amenable to the court as proceeding in contempt of its authority, and would be liable to punishment therefor by attachment and imprisonment.

The nature of the case as supposed is identical with that of the case as actually presented in the bill, with the single exception that the State is not named as a defendant. How else can the State be forbidden by judicial process to bring actions in its name, except by constraining the conduct of its officers, its attorneys, and its agents? And if all such officers, attorneys, and agents are personally subjected to the process of the court, so as to forbid their acting in its behalf, how can it be said that the State itself is not subjected to the jurisdiction of the court as an actual and real defendant?

It is, however, insisted upon in argument that it is within the jurisdiction of the Circuit Court of the United States to restrain by injunction officers of the States from executing the provisions of state statutes, void by reason of repugnancy to the Constitution of the United States; that there are many precedents in which that jurisdiction has been exercised under the sanction of this court; and that the present case is covered by their authority.

The principal authority relied upon to maintain this proposition is the judgment of this court in the case of Osborn v. Bank of U. S. 22 U. S. 9 Wheat. 738 [6:204]. As strengthening the argument based upon that decision, our attention is called by counsel to a feature of the case which it is said does not clearly appear from the official report by Mr. Wheaton. The original record of the case shows that the bill, after setting out the substance of the Act of the Legislature of Ohio complained of, alleged that Osborn, the Auditor of the State, and the officer upon whom the execution of the statute of the State was enjoined, "daily gives it out in speeches that he will execute and enforce the provisions of the said Act of Ohio against your orators." And it is part of the prayer of the bill "to stay and enjoin said Ralph Osborn, auditor as aforesaid, and all others which it may concern in anywise, from proceeding against your orators under and in virtue of the Act of Ohio aforesaid, or any section, part, or provision thereof." It also appears that it was part of the decree of the circuit court, from which the appeal was prosecuted, "that the defendants and each of them be perpetually enjoined from proceeding to collect any tax, which has accrued or may hereafter accrue, from the complainants under the Act of the General Assembly of Ohio in the bill and proceedings mentioned." But the Act of the Legislature of Ohio, declared to be unconstitutional and void in that case, had for its sole purpose the levy and collection of an annual tax of $50,000 upon each office of discount and deposit of the Bank of the United States within that State, to be collected, in case of refusal to pay, by the Auditor of State by a levy upon the money, bank notes, or other goods and chattels, the property of the bank, to seize which it was made lawful, under the warrant of the auditor, for the person to whom it was directed, to enter the bank for the purpose of finding and seizing property to satisfy the same. The wrong complained of and sought to be prevented by the injunction prayed for was this threatened seizure of the property of the bank. An actual seizure thereof, in violation of the injunction, was treated as a contempt of the court, for which the parties were attached, and the final decree of the circuit court restored the property taken to the possession of the complainant. In disposing of the case in this court, the opinion of Chief Justice Marshall, page 871 [235], concludes as follows: "We think then that there is no error in the decree of the Circuit Court for the District of Ohio, so far as it directs restitution of the specific sum of $98,000, which was taken out of the bank unlawfully and was in the possession of the defendant Samuel Sullivan when the injunction was awarded in September, 1820, to restrain him from paying it away, or in any manner using it, and so far as it directs the payment of the remaining sum of $2,000 by the defendants Ralph Osborn and John L. Harper; but that the same is erroneous so far as respects the interest on the coin, part of the said $98,000, it being the opinion of this court that while the parties were restrained by the authority of the circuit court from using it they ought not to be charged with interest. The decree of the Circuit Court for the District of Ohio is affirmed as to the said sums of $98,000 and $2,000, and reversed as to the residue."

The mandate from this court was in accordance with the terms of this judgment.

There is nothing, therefore, in the judgment in that cause as finally defined which extends its authority beyond the prevention and restraint of the specific act done in pursuance of the unconstitutional statute of Ohio, and in violation of the Act of Congress chartering the bank, which consisted of the unlawful seizure and detention of its property. It was conceded throughout that case, in the argument at the 500 Bar and in the opinion of the court, that an action at law would lie, either of trespass or detinue, against the defendants as individual trespassers guilty of a wrong in taking the property of the complainant illegally, vainly seeking to defend themselves under the authority of a void Act of the General Assembly of Ohio. One of the principal questions in the case was whether equity had jurisdiction to restrain the commission of such a mere trespass, a jurisdiction which was upheld upon the circumstances and nature of the case, and which has been repeatedly exercised since. But the very ground on which it was adjudged not to be a suit against the State, and not to be one in which the State was a necessary party, was that the defendants personally and individually were wrongdoers, against whom the complainants had a clear right of action for the recovery of the property taken, or its value, and that therefore it was a case in which no other parties were necessary. The right asserted and the relief asked were against the defendants as individuals. They sought to protect themselves against personal liability by their official character as representatives of the State. This they were not permitted to do, because the authority under which they professed to act was void.

In pursuance of the principles adjudged in the case of Osborn v. Bank of U. S. supra, it has been repeatedly and uniformly held by this court that an injunction will lie to restrain the collection of taxes sought to be collected by seizures of property imposed in the name of the State, but contrary to the Constitution of the United States, the defendants being officers of the State threatening the distraint complained of. The grounds of this jurisdiction were stated in Allen v. Baltimore & O. R. R. Co. 114 U. S. 311 [29: 200]. The vital principal in all such cases is that the defendants, though professing to act as officers of the State, are threatening a violation of the person or property rights of the complainant, for which they are personally and individually liable. This principle was plainly stated in the opinion of the court in Poindexter v. Greenhow, 114 U. S. 270 [29: 185], as follows, page 282 [190]: "The case then of the plaintiff below is reduced to this: He had paid the tax demanded of him by a lawful tender. The defendant had no au-501 thority of law thereafter to attempt to enforce other payment by seizing his property. In doing so he ceased to be an officer of the law, and became a private wrongdoer. It is the simple case in which the defendant, a natural private person, has unlawfully with force and arms seized, taken, and detained the personal property of another." It was also stated, page 288 [192]: "The ratio decidendi in this class of cases is very plain. A defendant sued as a wrongdoer, who seeks to substitute the State in his place, or to justify by the authority of the State, or to defend on the ground that the State has adopted his act and exonerated him, cannot rest on the bare assertion of his defense. He is bound to establish it. The state is a political corporate body, can act only through agents, and can command only by laws. It is necessary, therefore, for such a defendant, in order to complete his defense, to produce a law of the State which constitutes his commission as its agent and a warrant for his act. This the defendant in the present case undertook to do." The legislation under which the defendant justified being declared to be null and void as contrary to the Constitution of the United States, therefore, left him defenseless, subject to answer to the consequences of his personal act in the seizure and detention of the plaintiff's property, and responsible for the damages occasioned thereby.

This principle is illustrated and enforced by the case of U. S. v. Lee, 106 U. S. 196 [27:171]. In that case the plaintiffs had been wrongfully dispossessed of their real estate by defendants claiming to act under the authority of the United States. That authority could exist only as it was conferred by law, and as they were unable to show any lawful authority under the United States it was held that there was nothing to prevent the judgment of the court against them as individuals, for their individual wrong and trespass. This feature will be found, on an examination, to characterize every case where persons have been made defendants for acts done or threatened by them as officers of the government, either of a State or of the United States, where the objection has been interposed that the State was the real defendant, and has been overruled. The action has been 502 sustained only in those instances where the act complained of, considered apart from the official authority alleged as its justification, and as the personal act of the individual defendant, constituted a violation of right for which the plaintiff was entitled to a remedy at law or in equity against the wrongdoer in his individual character.

The present case stands upon a footing altogether different. Admitting all that is claimed on the part of the complainants as to the breach of its contract on the part of the State of Virginia by the Acts of its General Assembly referred to in the bill of complaint, there is nevertheless no foundation in law for the relief asked. For a breach of its contract by the State, it is conceded there is no remedy by suit against the State itself. This results from the 11th Amendment to the Constitution, which secures to the State immunity from suit by individual citizens of other States or aliens. This immunity includes not only direct actions for damages for the breach of the contract brought against the State by name, but all other actions and suits against it, whether at law or in equity. A bill in equity for the specific performance of the contract against the State by name, it is admitted, could not be brought. In Hagood v. Southern, 117 U. S. 52 [29: 805], it was decided that in such a bill, where the State was not nominally a party to the record, brought against its officer and agents, having no personal interest in the subject matter of the suit, and defending only as representing the State, where "The things required by the decree to be done and performed by them are the very things which, when done and performed, constitute a performance of the alleged contract by the State," the court was without jurisdiction, because it was a suit against a State.

The converse of that proposition must be equally true, because it is contained in it: that is, a bill, the object of which is by injunction, indirectly, to compel the specific performance of the contract, by forbidding all those acts and doings which constitute breaches of the contract, must also, necessarily, be a suit against the State. In such a case, though the State be not nominally a party on the record, if the defendants are its officers and agents, through whom alone it can act in doing and refusing to do the things which constitute a breach of its contract, the suit is still, in substance, though not in form, a suit against the State. Such is the precise character of the suit in the circuit court against the petitioners in which the order was made, the violation of which constitutes the contempt for which they have been committed to the imprisonment from which they seek delivery by these writs.

It may be asked what is the true ground of distinction, so far as the protection of the Constitution of the United States is invoked, between the contract rights of the complainant in such a suit, and other rights of person and of property? In these latter cases it is said that jurisdiction may be exercised against individual defendants, notwithstanding the official character of their acts, while in cases of the former description the jurisdiction is denied.

The distinction, however, is obvious. The acts alleged in the bill as threatened by the defendants, the present petitioners, are violations of the assumed contract between the State of Virginia and the complainants, only as they are considered to be the Acts of the State of Virginia. The defendants, as individuals, not being parties to that contract, are not capable in law of committing a breach of it. There is no remedy for a breach of a contract, actual or apprehended, except upon the contract itself, and between those who are by law parties to it. In a certain sense and in certain ways the Constitution of the United States protects contracts against laws of a State subsequently passed impairing their obligation, and this provision is recognized as extending to contracts between an individual and a State; but this, as is apparent, is subject to the other constitutional principle, of equal authority, contained in the 11th Amendment, which secures to the State an immunity from suit. Wherever the question arises in a litigation between individuals, which does not involve a suit against a State, the contract will be judicially recognized as of binding force, notwithstanding any subsequent law of the State impairing its obligation. But this right is incidental to the judicial proceeding, in the course of which the question concerning it arises. It is not a positive and substantive right of an absolute character, secured by the Constitution of the United States against every possible infraction, or for which redress is given as against strangers to the contract itself, for the injurious consequences of acts done or omitted by them. Accordingly, it was held in Carter v. Greenhow, 114 U. S. 317 [29:202], that no direct action for the denial of the right secured by a contract, other than upon the contract itself would lie under any provisions of the Statutes of the United States authorizing actions to redress the deprivation, under color of state law, of any right, privilege, or immunity secured by the Constitution of the United States. In that case it was said, page 322 [204]: "How, and in what sense, are these rights secured to him by the Constitution of the United States? The answer is, by the provision of article I, section 10, which forbids any State to pass laws impairing the obligation of contracts. That constitutional provision, so far as it can be said to confer upon or secure to any person any individual rights, does so only indirectly and incidentally. It forbids the passage by the States of laws such as are described. If any such are, nevertheless, passed by the Legislature of a State, they are unconstitutional and void. In any judicial proceeding necessary to vindicate his rights under a contract affected by such legislation, the individual has a right to have a judicial determination declaring the nullity of the attempt to impair its obligation. This is the only right secured to him by that clause of the Constitution." But where the contract is between the individual and the State, no action will lie against the State, and any action founded upon it against defendants who are officers of the State, the object of which is to enforce its specific performance by compelling those things to be done by the defendants which, when done, would constitute a performance by the State, or to forbid the doing of those things which, if done, would be merely breaches of the contract by the State, is in substance a suit against the State itself, and equally within the prohibition of the Constitution.

It cannot be doubted that the 11th Amendment to the Constitution operates to create an important distinction between contracts of a State with individuals and contracts between individual parties. In the case of contracts between individuals, the remedies for their enforcement or breach, in existence at the time they were entered into, are a part of the agreement itself, and constitute a substantial part of its obligation. Louisana v. New Orleans, 102 U. S. 203 [26:132]. That obligation, by virtue of the provision of article I, section 10, of the Constitution of the United States, cannot be impaired by any subsequent state legislation. Thus, not only the covenants and conditions of the contract are preserved, but also the substance of the original remedies for its enforcement. It is different with contracts between individuals and a State. In respect to these, by virtue of the 11th Amendment to the Constitution, there being no remedy by a suit against the State, the contract is substantially without sanction, except that which arises out of the honor and good faith of the State itself, and these are not subject to coercion. Although the State may, at the inception of the contract, have consented as one of its conditions to subject itself to suit, it may subsequently withdraw that consent and resume its original immunity without any violation of the obligation of its contract in the constitutional sense. Beers v. Arkansas, 61 U. S. 20 How. 527 [15:991]; Memphis & C. R. R. Co. v. Tennessee, 101 U. S. 337 [25:960]. The very object and purpose of the Eleventh Amendment were to prevent the indignity of subjecting a State to the coercive process of judicial tribunals at the instance of private parties. It was thought to be neither becoming nor convenient that the several States of the Union, invested with that large residuum of sovereignty which had not been delegated to the United States, should be summoned as defendants to answer the complaints of private persons, whether citizens of other States or aliens, or that the course of their public policy and the administration of their public affairs should be subject to and controlled by the mandates of judicial tribunals without their consent, and in favor of individual interests. To secure the manifest purposes of the constitutional exemption guaranteed by the 11th Amendment requires that it should be interpreted not literally and too narrowly, but fairly, and with 506 such breadth and largeness as effectually to accomplish the substance of its purpose. In this spirit it must be held to cover, not only suits brought against a State by name, but those also against its officers, agents, and representatives, where the State, though not named as such, is, nevertheless, the only real party against which alone in fact the relief is asked, and against which the judgment or decree effectively operates.

But this is not intended in any way to impinge upon the principle which justifies suits against individual defendants, who, under color of the authority of unconstitutional legislation by the State, are guilty of personal trespasses and wrongs, nor to forbid suits against officers in their official capacity either to arrest or direct their official action by injunction or mandamus, where such suits are authorized by law, and the act to be done or omitted is purely ministerial, in the performance or omission of which the plaintiff has a legal interest. In respect to the latter class of cases we repeat what was said by this court in Board of Liquidation v. McComb, 92 U. S. 531, 541 [23: 623, 628]: "A State, without its consent, cannot be sued by an individual; and a court cannot substitute its own discretion for that of executive officers in matters belonging to the proper jurisdiction of the latter. But it has been well settled that when a plain official duty, requiring no exercise of discretion, is to be performed, and performance is refused, any person who will sustain personal injury by such refusal may have a mandamus to compel its performance; and when such duty is threatened to be violated by some positive official act, any person who will sustain personal injury thereby, for which adequate compensation cannot be had at law, may have an injunction to prevent it. In such cases the writs of mandamus and injunction are somewhat correlative to each other. In either case, if the officer plead the authority of an unconstitutional law for the nonperformance or violation of his duty, it will not prevent the issuing of the writ. An unconstitutional law will be treated by the courts as null and void." An example and illustration of this class will be found in Seibert v. Lewis, 122 U. S. 284 [30: 1161].
507 Nor need it be apprehended that the construction of the 11th Amendment, applied in this case, will in anywise embarrass or obstruct the execution of the laws of the United States, in cases where officers of a State are guilty of acting in violation of them under color of its authority. The Government of the United States, in the enforcement of its laws, deals with all persons within its territorial jurisdiction, as individuals owing obedience to its authority. The penalties of disobedience may be visited upon them, without regard to the character in which they assume to act, or the nature of the exemption they may plead in justification. Nothing can be interposed between the individual and the obligation he owes to the Constitution and laws of the United States, which can shield or defend him from their just authority; and the extent and limits of that authority the Government of the United States, by means of its judicial power, interprets and applies for itself. If, therefore, an individual, acting under the assumed authority of a State, as one of its officers, and under color of its laws, comes into conflict with the superior authority of a valid law of the United States, he is stripped of his representative character, and subjected in his person to the consequences of his individual conduct. The State has no power to impart to him any immunity from responsibility to the supreme authority of the United States.

In contradistinction to these classes of cases, for the reasons given, we adjudge the suit of Cooper v. Marye, in which the injunctions were granted against the present petitioners, to be in substance and in law a suit against the State of Virginia. It is, therefore, within the prohibition of the 11th Amendment to the Constitution. By the terms of that provision, it is a case to which the judicial power of the United States does not extend. The circuit court was without jurisdiction to entertain it. All the proceedings in the exercise of the jurisdiction which it assumed are null and void. The orders forbidding the petitioners to bring the suits, for bringing which they were adjudged in contempt of its authority, it had no power to make. The orders adjudging them in contempt were 508 equally void, and their imprisonment is without authority of law.

It is ordered, therefore, that the petitioners be discharged.

Mr. Justice Field, concurring:

I concur in the judgment discharging from arrest and imprisonment the Attorney-General of Virginia, and other officers of the State, who were adjudged by the circuit court to be guilty of contempt in refusing to obey the order of that court in the case of Cooper v. Marye, and were fined, and committed until the fine should be paid, and they should purge themselves of their contempt by doing the acts commanded. I also concur in the main position stated in the opinion of the court, upon which the discharge of the petitioners is ordered; namely, that the case of Cooper v. Marye was in law and fact a suit by subjects of a foreign State against the State of Virginia. To a suit of that character the judicial power of the United States cannot, by the Eleventh Amendment of the Constitution, be extended. The object of that suit was to enjoin the Attorney-General and the Commonwealth's attorneys of the several counties, cities, and towns of Virginia from bringing any suits in the name of the Commonwealth to enforce the collection of taxes, for the payment of which coupons originally attached to her bonds had been tendered. To enjoin the officers of the Commonwealth, charged with the supervision and management of legal proceedings in her behalf, from bringing suits in her name, is nothing less than to enjoin the Commonwealth, for only by her officers can such suits be instituted and prosecuted. This seems to me an obvious conclusion.

The reason given in the bill in Cooper v. Marye, for seeking the injunction is, that the State has passed various Acts creating impediments in the way of holders of coupons establishing their genuineness, by which their value will be practically destroyed, and the performance of these obligations be evaded, unless the officers of the State are restrained from prosecuting such suits. The numerous devices to which the State has resorted in order to escape from her obligations under the forms of law may, it is true, seriously embarrass the coupon holder in the assertion of his claims; but that is not a sufficient reason for denying to the State the right to prosecute her demands for taxes in her own courts. If the obstacles to the maintenance of the claims of the coupon holder, presented by the state legislation, are repugnant to the Constitution and laws of the United States, we cannot assume in advance that they will be sustained by the courts of Virginia when the coupons tendered are produced in the suits mentioned, and for that reason deny to her a hearing there upon her own demands. If they should be sustained, a remedy may be found in this tribunal, where decisions in conflict with the Constitution and laws of the United States may be reviewed and corrected.

There are many cases—indeed, they are of frequent occurrence—where officers of the State, acting under legislation in conflict with the Constitution and laws of the United States, may be restrained by the federal courts—as where those officers attempt, by virtue of such legislation, to take private property for public use without offering compensation, or in other ways to deprive one of the use and enjoyment of his property. I do not understand that the opinion of the court is against this doctrine; but, on the contrary, that it is recognized and approved. There is a wide difference between restraining officers of the State from interfering in such cases with the property of the citizen, and restraining them from prosecuting a suit in the name of the State in her own courts to collect an alleged claim. Her courts are at all times as open to her for the prosecution of her demands as they are open to her citizens for the prosecution of their claims.

I, however, make this special concurrence in the opinion of the majority because of language in it expressing approval of the positions taken by the court in Louisiana v. Jumel, from which I dissented—not agreeing with the majority either in the statement of the object of that case, or in the law applicable to it. 107 U. S. 728 [27:454]. I considered that case as brought to compel the officers of the State to do what she had by her laws and former Constitution consented they might by the judicial tribunals be required to do. I expressed, at the time, against the majority of the court, my conviction of the invalidity and unconstitutionality of the ordinance of repudiation embodied in the new Constitution of Louisiana. At the same time I also expressed in Antoni v. Greenhow my opinion of the equally invalid legislation of Virginia. 107 U. S. 784 [27:474]. I adhere to my dissenting opinions in those cases, and in concurring in the judgment in this case I do not in any respect depart from or qualify what I there said.

Mr. Justice Harlan, dissenting:

As I adhere to the views expressed by me in Louisiana v. Jumel, 107 U. S. 746 [27:460]; Antoni v. Greenhow, Id. 841 [27:480] and Cunningham v. Macon & B. R. Co. 109 U. S. 458 [27:996]; and as I concurred in the judgments in Poindexter v. Greenhow, 114 U. S. 273 [29:186] and Allen v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. Id. 311 [29:200] I feel obliged to dissent from the opinion and judgment in these cases.

In Cooper v. Marye the jurisdiction of the circuit court cannot be questioned, so far as it depends upon the citizenship of the parties; for the plaintiffs are subjects or citizens of Great Britain, and the defendants are citizens of Virginia.

Whether the plaintiffs merely as holders of Virginia coupons, and not taxpayers in the Commonwealth, have any legal ground of complaint, by reason of the refusal of her officers to accept, when tendered, like coupons which the plaintiffs sold or transferred to taxpayers to be used in meeting their taxes; whether the statutes under which those officers proceeded, or intend to proceed, are repugnant to the Constitution of the United States, and, therefore, void; whether the preliminary injunction in question should or should not have been refused upon the ground that such taxpayers have a complete and adequate remedy at law; whether the necessity of avoiding conflicts between the courts of the United States and the officers of a State, acting in obedience to her statutes, was not ample reason for refusing to grant such injunction; or whether an officer ought to be enjoined from merely bringing a suit in behalf of the public—the suit itself not necessarily, or before judgment therein, involving an invasion of the property rights of the defendant therein—are all matters which the circuit court, sitting in equity, was competent to determine upon the final hearing in Cooper v. Marye, etc. Those questions are not open for consideration here except upon the appeal from the final decree in that case; consequently, I am not at liberty now to express an opinion as to any of them.

The only inquiry now to be made is whether Cooper v. Marye is a suit against Virginia within the meaning of the 11th Amendment to the Constitution of the United States. If it be, I agree that the prisoners must be discharged; for the judicial power of the United States does not extend to suits against a State by citizens of another State, or by subjects of foreign countries.

But I am of opinion that it is not a suit of that character. I stand upon what was adjudged in Orborn v. U. S. Bank, 22 U. S. 9 Wheat. 857 [6:232]; Chief Justice Marshall, speaking for the court in that case, said: "It may, we think, be laid down as a rule which admits of no exception, that in all cases where jurisdiction depends on the party, it is the party named on the record. Consequently, the 11th Amendment, which restrains the jurisdiction granted by the Constitution over suits against States, is, of necessity, limited to those suits in which a State is a party on the record. The amendment has its full effect, if the Constitution be construed as it would have been construed had the jurisdiction of the court never been extended to suits brought against a State by the citizen of another State, or by aliens. The State not being a party on the record, and the court having jurisdiction over those who are parties on the record, the true question is not one of jurisdiction, but whether, in the exercise of its jurisdiction, the court ought to make a decree against the defendants; whether they are to be considered as having a real interest, or as being only nominal parties."

These principles have been recognized in several decisions of this court, notably in U. S. v. Lee and Kaufman v. Lee, 106 U. S. 196, 218, 215 [27:171, 179, 180]. That was an action to recover a body of land in Alexandria County, Virginia, two hundred acres of which constituted Arlington Cemetery, previously established by the United States as a military station and as a national cemetery for the soldiers and sailors of the Union. When the action was brought that cemetery was in the actual possession of the United States, by the defendants, as their officers. Those officers certainly had no personal interest in the result of the suit. They simply represented the United States, who were the real parties in interest. As the United States were not parties to the record, and because they could not be made parties, the court proceeded to a determination of the case between the parties before it. The result was a judgment, determining that Lee had a legal right to the possession of Arlington cemetery, as against the officers of the United States having it under their control. The authority and duty of the court to proceed in the case, notwithstanding the United States were not before the court, was rested mainly upon the decision in Osborn v. Bank of U. S. from which was quoted, with emphatic approval, the following language: "If the State of Ohio could have been made a party defendant, it can scarcely be denied that this would be a strong case for an injunction. The objection is that as the real party cannot be brought before the court, a suit cannot be sustained against the agent of that party; and cases have been cited to show that a court of chancery will not make a decree unless all those who are substantially interested be made parties to the suit. This is certainly true where it is in the power of the plaintiff to make them parties; but if the person who is the real principal, the person who is the true source of the mischief, by whose power and for whose advantage it is done, be himself above the law, be exempt from all judicial process, it would be subversive of the best established principles to say that the laws could not afford the same remedies against the agent employed in doing the wrong which they would afford against him could his principal be joined in the suit." And in order that no one might suppose that Osborn v. Bank of U. S. had been modified or overruled by subsequent decisions, the court in the Lee Case, after referring to several decisions, said: "These decisions have never been overruled. On the contrary, as late as the case of Davis v. Gray, 83 U. S. 16 Wall. 203 [21:447], the case of Osborn v. Bank of U. S. is cited with approval, as establishing these, among other propositions: 'Where the State is concerned, the State should be made a party, if it can be done. That it cannot be done is a sufficient reason for the omission to do it, and the court may proceed to decree against the officers of the State in all respects as if the State were a party to the record. In deciding who are parties to the suit, the court will not look beyond the record. Making a state officer a party does not make the State a party, although her law may have prompted his action, and the State may stand behind him as a real party in interest. A State can be made a party only by shaping the bill expressly with that view, as where individuals or corporations are intended to be put in that relation to the case.' Though not prepared to say now that the court can proceed against the officer 'in all respects' as if the State were a party, this may be taken as intimating, in a general way, the views of the court at the time."

In Poindexter v. Greenhow, 114 U. S. 270 [29:185] we sustained a suit by a private individual against a treasurer, charged with the duty of collecting taxes, to recover certain personal property which the defendant had seized for the nonpayment of taxes due Virginia from the plaintiff in that suit. In seizing the property the officer disregarded the tender, previously made, of the State's coupons. It was earnestly contended that as the officer only did what the State by her statutes had commanded him to do, and had himself no personal interest in the matter, the suit against him was, in legal effect, one against the State; that a suit to recover property seized for the nonpayment of taxes, in conformity with the Statutes of Virginia, had the same result as a direct suit against the State to compel her performance of her contract with the coupon holder, or to enjoin her officer from carrying those statutes into effect. But this view was overruled, mainly upon the authority of Osborn v. Bank of U. S., from which the court quoted, with approval, the same passages as are to be found in the opinion in Lee's Case, and in reference thereto observed: "This language, it may be observed, was quoted with approval in U. S. v. Lee. The principal which it enunciates constitutes the very foundation upon which the decision in that case rested." In Poindexter's Case we said that the immunity from suit secured to the States by the Constitution "does not exempt the State from the operation of the constitutional provision that no State shall pass any law impairing the obligation of contracts; for it has long been settled that contracts between a State and an individual are as fully protected by the Constitution as contracts between two individuals. It is true that no remedy for a breach of its contract by a State, by way of damages as compensation, or by means of process to compel its performance, is open, under the Constitution, in the courts of the United States, by a direct suit against the State itself, on the part of the injured party, being a citizen of another State, or a citizen or subject of a foreign State. But it is equally true that whenever, in a controversy between parties to a suit, of which these courts have jurisdiction, the question arises upon the validity of a law by a State impairing the obligation of its contract, the jurisdiction is not thereby ousted, but must be exercised, with whatever legal consequences to the rights of the litigants may be the result of the determination."

Upon identically the same grounds rests our decision in Allen v. Baltimore & O. R. R. Co. 114 U. S. 311 [27: 200] in which we maintained the right of that company to an injunction to prevent the collection of taxes by distraint upon its property after a tender of the States tax receivable coupons in payment of such taxes. That suit was against the Auditor of Public Accounts and the Treasurer of Virginia. They certainly had no personal interest in the collection of the taxes, but were only obeying the statutes of the State which they assumed to be constitutional and binding upon them. But the effect of that suit was to say to the State of Virginia that she should not collect her revenue in the mode proposed by the statute, and thereby violate rights secured by the Constitution of the United States. In vain was it urged by the officers of the State that Virginia was the real party in interest; that, as the State could only act by her officers, to enjoin them was to enjoin the State; and that consequently the suit was one against the State within the meaning of the 11th Amendment. This court overruled that contention, holding in substance that, the State of Virginia not being named as a party, and it being impossible to make her a party, her officers could be prevented from touching the property of the railroad under a statute void under the Constitution of the United States.

The result, then, of former decisions is: That a suit against officers of the United States to recover property not legally in their possession is not a suit against the United States; and that neither a suit against officers of the State to recover property illegally taken by them in obedience to the statutes of the State, nor a suit brought against state officers to enjoin them from taking, under the command of the State, the property of a taxpayer who has tendered coupons for taxes due to her, were suits against the State within the meaning of the 11th Amendment of the Constitution. And now it is adjudged, in the cases before us, that a suit merely against state officers to enjoin them from bringing actions against taxpayers who have previously tendered tax-receivable coupons is a suit against the State. There is, I grant, a difference between the cases heretofore decided and the case of Cooper v. Marye; but the difference is not such as to involve the jurisdiction of the circuit court, but rather—to use the language of Chief Justice Marshall, "the exercise of its jurisdiction."

The Commonwealth of Virginia has no more authority to enact statutes impairing the obligation of her contracts than statutes impairing the obligation of contracts exclusively between individuals. New Jersey v. Wilson, 11 U. S. 7 Cranch, 164, 166 [3: 303]; Providence Bank v. Billings, 29 U. S. 4 Pet. 514, 560 [7: 939, 955]; Green v. Biddle, 21 U. S. 8 Wheat. 1, 84 [5: 547, 568]; Woodruff v. Trapnall, 51 U. S. 10 How. 190, 207 [13: 383, 390]; Wolff v. New Orleans, 103 U. S. 358, 367 [26: 395, 399]; New Orleans Gas Co. v. Louisiana Light Co. 115 U. S. 650, 673 [29: 516, 524]. A statute which is void, as impairing the obligation of the State's contract, affords no justification to anyone, and confers no authority. If an officer proposes to enforce such a statute against a party, the obligation of whose contract is sought to be impaired, the latter, in my judgment, may proceed, by suit, against such officer, and thereby obtain protection in his rights of contract, as against the proposed action of that officer. A contrary view enables the State to use her immunity from suit to effect what the Constitution of the United States forbids her from doing; namely, to enact statutes impairing the obligation of her contract. If an officer of the State can take shelter behind such immunity while he proceeds with the execution of a void enactment to the injury of the citizen's rights of contract, it would look as if that provision which declares that the Constitution of the United States shall be the supreme law of the land, anything in the constitution or laws of a State to the contrary notwithstanding, had lost most, if not all, of its value in respect to contracts which a State makes with individuals.

I repeat, that the difference between a suit against officers of the State, enjoining them from seizing the property of the citizen, in obedience to a void statute of the State, and a suit enjoining such officers from bringing under the order of the State, and in her name, an action which, it is alleged, will result in injury to the rights of the complainant, is not a difference that affects the jurisdiction of the court, but only its exercise of jurisdiction. If the former is not a suit against the State, the latter should not be deemed of that class.

Supersedeas—violations of.

1. The supersedeas, provided for in section 1007 of the Revised Statutes, stays process for the execution of the judgment or decree brought under review by the writ of error or appeal to which it belongs. It operates on the judgment or decree, not on the questions involved considered apart from the particular suit in which they were decided.

2. New suits, not brought to give effect to the judgment in the case, but to enjoin the plaintiffs in error from further violation of the ordinance which was the foundation of the prosecution now here for review, are not violations of the supersedeas in this case.

Submitted Dec. 2, 1887. Decided Dec. 5, 1887.

IN ERROR to the Supreme Court of the State of Louisiana.

On motion for a rule on the Mayor of the City of New Orleans, and on the lessee of the public markets of that city, to show cause why they should not be punished for a contempt of the supersedeas in this case. Denied.

The present proceedings result from the action of J. V. Guillotte, Mayor of the City of New Orleans, at the instance of Henry Larquié, lessee of the public markets of said city, in instituting suit against Joseph Hug, Timothé Rouche, August Spraul, and Joseph Natal, plaintiffs in error in the above entitled cases, for causes identical in every particular with the previous suits, now before this court by writs of error to the Supreme Court of the State of Louisiana, and this, after all the requirements were fulfilled, by the said plaintiffs in error furnishing bond, as supersedeas, in accordance with the Statutes of the United States in such case made and provided. Under color of such subsequent suits, one John Kenny, under pay of the said Larquié, and acting as a special policeman by appointment of the said mayor, had the said plaintiffs in error arrested and imprisoned, and a firm of attorneys, Blane & Butler by name, acting as counsel for the said Larquié, drew up petitions, which were signed by the said mayor, by which injunctions were obtained from the Civil District Court for the Parish of Orleans, and the places of business of said plaintiffs in error were forcibly closed by the Sheriff of the said Parish of Orleans.

The further facts are stated by the court.

This motion is denied. The plaintiffs in error were proceeded against in the name of the State of Louisiana before the recorder of the first Recorder's Court of the City of New Orleans, for an alleged violation of an ordinance of that city. The judgment of the recorder's court does not appear in the printed record, but the case was taken by appeal to the Supreme Court of the State; and in the opinion of that court it is stated that the appeal was by the defendants "from judgments rendered against them for the payment of a fine, and in default of payment sentencing them to imprisonment for the violation of Ordinance No. 4798, A. S., which forbids the keeping of private markets within six squares of a public market within the limits of the City of New Orleans." The order of the supreme court was "That the judgment appealed from be affirmed, with costs."

To reverse this judgment of the supreme court the present writ of error was sued out, and a supersedeas obtained, in accordance with the provisions of section 1007, Revised Statutes, May 12, 1887. The complaint now is that with this supersedeas in force, the mayor of the city and the lessee of the public markets have caused suits to be begun in the Civil District Court of the Parish of New Orleans to enjoin the plaintiffs in error, and each of them, "from opening, maintainining, or carrying on a private market * * * anywhere * * * in the City of New Orleans within six squares of a public market," and "that the grounds on which said injunction are based are the same law and city ordinance, the same defendants, and the same location of mercantile business, as that involved in said writ of error, being the same persons and same course of action in said injunctions, and based on the same law and city ordinance, identical in every particular with the cases involved in said writ of error."

It is not alleged that any attempt has been made to carry the judgment which is here for review into execution. The whole gravamen of the charge made in support of this motion is, that the mayor and lessee of the markets have commenced another suit in another court upon another cause of action growing out of violations of the same ordinance. The supersedeas provided for in section 1007 of the Revised Statutes stays process for the execution of the judgment or decree brought under review by the writ of error or appeal to which it belongs. It operates on the judgment or decree, not on the questions involved considered apart from the particular suit in which they were decided. The new suits now complained of are not brought to give effect to the judgment in this case, but to enjoin the plaintiffs in error from further violations of the ordinance which was the foundation of the prosecution now here for review. This judgment is in no way connected with or made the basis of the injunction in the civil district court. Both suits may involve the consideration of the validity of the same ordinance, but the last is in no sense process for the execution of the judgment in the first. It follows that, upon the showing made by the plaintiffs in error themselves, there is no ground for proceeding here against the mayor or the lessee of the market, and that the rule ought not to issue.

We understand that the motions in 1272, 1273, and 1274 involve precisely the same question, and they are consequently also denied.

Federal question—decree, when a bar—state decision.

1. Where one pays the taxes on lands of which he is not the owner, and the real owner, when sued by the county for such taxes, sets up such payment as a defense, the question, whether he thereby made the previous act of payment his own and thus became obligated to the person making the payment to repay to him what he had paid, is not a federal question.

2. A decree is a bar to a subsequent suit for the same cause of action, but not to a suit for a different cause of action arising afterward.

3. If a federal question is fairly presented by the record and its decision is actually necessary to the determination of the case, a judgment which rejects the claim, but avoids all reference to it, is as much against the right, within the meaning of section 709 of the Revised Statutes, as if it had been specifically referred to and the right directly refused. But if a decision of such a question is rendered unnecessary by the view which the court properly takes of the case, within the scope of the pleadings, the judgment is not open to review here.

Argued Nov. 1, 1887. Decided Dec. 5, 1887.

IN ERROR to the Supreme Court of the State of Iowa. Affirmed.

The facts are fully stated by the court.

Messrs. C. H. Gatch, and Wm. Connor, for plaintiffs in error:

The record presents two federal questions:

1. Whether or not the plaintiffs in error were entitled to immunity from the demand of the defendant in error, under the decision and judgment of this court in the case of Iowa Homestead Co. v. DesMoines Nav. & R. R. Co. 84 U. S. 17 Wall. 153 (21: 622).

2. The plaintiff in error claimed immunity from the demand of the defendant in error, by force and virtue of the decision of this court in the case of Wolcott v. Des Moines Nav. & R. R. Co. 72 U. S. 5 Wall. 681 (18: 689), and Burr v. DesMoines Nav. & R. R. Co. 68 U. S. 1 Wall. 99 (17: 561).

Whether or not defendants in error were estopped by the judgment of the court in the case of Iowa Homestead Co. v. DesMoines Nav. & R. R. Co. was a federal question.

Mackay v. Dillon, 45 U. S. 4 How. 421 (11: 1038); Kennedy v. Hunt, 48 U. S. 7 How. 586 (12: 829).

The judgment under which immunity is claimed is still the judgment, unreversed and in full force, of this court.

Crowell v. Randell, 35 U. S. 10 Pet. 368 (9: 458); Miller v. Nicholls, 17 U. S. 4 Wheat. 311 (4: 578); Hickie v. Starke, 26 U. S. 1 Pet. 98 (7: 69); Wilson v. Black Bird Creek Marsh Co. 27 U. S. 2 Pet. 245 (7: 412); Williams v. Norris, 25 U. S. 12 Wheat. 117 (6: 571); Williams v. Bruffy, 102 U. S. 248 (26: 135); Chicago L. Ins. Co. v. Needles, 113 U. S. 574 (28: 1084); Brown v. Colorado, 106 U. S. 97 (27: 133); McManus v. O'Sullivan, 91 U. S. 578 (23: 390); Murdock v. Memphis, 87 U. S. 20 Wall. 590, 636 (22; 429, 444); Chouteau v. Gibson, 111 U. S. 200 (28; 400); Detroit City R. Co. v. Guthard, 114 U. S. 133 (29: 118).

The decision of this court, in the case of Wolcott v. DesMoines Nav. & R. R. Co. supra, was a final determination of the question of title and the Iowa decision, holding it not to have been, presents a federal question.

Williams v. Baker, 84 U. S. 17 Wall. 144 (21: 561); Iowa Homestead Co. v. DesMoines Nav. & R. R. Co., supra; Litchfield v. Webster County, 101 U. S. 777 (25: 927); Dupasseur v. Rochereau, 88 U. S. 21 Wall. 130 (22: 588); Embry v. Palmer, 107 U. S. 20 (27: 352); Crescent City Live Stock etc. Co. v. Butchers Union, etc. Co. 120 U. S. 143 (30: 615); Factors & T. Ins. Co. v. Murphy, 111 U. S. 738 (28: 582).

Mr. George Crane, for defendant in error:

The record in the Homestead Suit showed affirmatively that the DesMoines Navigation & Railroad Company was a citizen of the same State with the plaintiff in that suit; that said company was an indispensable party to the suit brought, and hence that the federal courts had no jurisdiction to make a valid determination of any issues involved therein.

Shainwald v. Lewis, 108 U. S. 158 (27: 691); Cameron v. M'Roberts, 16 U. S. 3 Wheat. 591 (4: 467); Mansfield, C. & L. M. R. Co. v. Swan, 111 U. S. 385 (28: 464); Ober v. Gallagher, 93 U. S. 201 (23: 829).

In suits brought from the Supreme Court of Iowa this court can examine the opinions of that one, for the purpose of ascertaining what has been decided therein.

Jacks v. Helena, 115 U. S. 288 (29: 392); Murdock v. Memphis, 87 U. S. 20 Wall. 590 (22: 429); Adams County v. Burlington & M. R. R. Co. 112 U. S. 123 (28: 678).

In disposing of the defense of former adjudication no question of federal cognizance was decided.

Linton v. Stanton, 58 U. S. 12 How. 426 (13: 1051); Adams County v. Burlington & M. R. R. Co. supra.

At the time this court rendered its decision in the Homestead Suit there was no cause of action.

Freem. Judg. 368; Hurst v. Means, 2 Sneed (Tenn.) 549.

The question involves no question of federal cognizance.

New York L. Ins. Co. v. Hendren, 92 U. S. 286 (23: 709); Kennebec & P. R. R. Co. v. Portland & K. R. R. Co. 81 U. S. 14 Wall. 25 (20: 851); Gibson v. Chouteau, 75 U. S. 8 Wall. 314 (19: 317); Murdock v. Memphis, 87 U. S. 20 Wall. 633 (22: 443).

The claim for the taxes being a cause of action arising within this State, the Limitation Statute of New York ceased to apply to it in 1870.

Goodnow v. Stryker, 62 Iowa, 224; Higgins v. Mendenhall, 42 Iowa, 675.

When a cause of action accrues under the statutes of a State, or when the Statute of Limitation begins to run, are necessarily questions for the determination of the state and not the federal courts.

Messrs. C. H. Gatch and Wm. Connor, for plaintiffs in error, in reply:

In Skillern v. May, 10 U. S. 6 Cranch, 267 (3:220), it was held too late to question the jurisdiction of the circuit court after the cause has been sent back by mandate.

McCormick v. Sullivant, 23 U. S. 10 Wheat. 192 (6: 300).

In Kennedy v. Georgia State Bank, 49 U. S. 8 How. 586 (12: 1209), it was held that if the jurisdiction of a circuit court is not shown in the proceedings in the case, its judgment is erroneous and liable to be reversed, but is not an absolute nullity.

Washington Bridge Co. v. Stewart, 44 U. S. 3 How. 413 (11: 658); DeSobry v. Nicholson, 70 U. S. 3 Wall. 420 (18: 263).

This court will consider and determine questions of state or common law, for purposes which involve questions giving it jurisdiction.

These are writs of error for the review of two judgments of the Supreme Court of Iowa, one against Richard B. Chapman, and the other against John Stryker, in suits brought by Edward K. Goodnow, assignee of the Iowa Homestead Company, in his lifetime, to recover money paid by the homestead company for taxes levied by the county of Webster on Des Moines River lands belonging to Chapman and Stryker respectively, for the years 1864 to 1871, both inclusive. For a statement of the general facts on which the right of recovery depends reference is made to the case of Stryker v. Crane, ante, 194. The homestead company assigned its claims against these owners after the decree in the suit of Iowa Homestead Co. v. Des Moines Nav. & R. R. Co. 84 U. S. 17 Wall. 153 [21: 622], was rendered.

The suits were begun August 5, 1876, and in each case a demurrer was filed to the original petition January 19, 1877. On the 12th of February, 1879, the County of Webster appeared in each of the suits and filed a petition therein setting forth "That the taxes mentioned in said petition (that of Goodnow) were duly and legally assessed and levied by said county upon the lands therein mentioned, at the times, for the years and amounts, and in the manner and form alleged and set forth in said petition, and that the said taxes at the times of the said several assessments became and were and still are a valid and binding lien upon said lands in favor of said county;" that Chapman and Stryker were the owners in fee of the several tracts by them respectively claimed at the times of the levies, "and in duty bound to pay said taxes to said county;" that the said taxes had never been paid, and the "whole thereof is still due to said county from the said defendant." Each of these petitions concluded with a prayer for judgment against the defendant for the amount of the taxes, and the enforcement of a lien on the lands for the payment thereof.

On the 5th of April, 1879, Goodnow filed an amendment to his original petition in each of the cases, in which he alleged that when the homestead company paid the taxes to the county "It was agreed and understood that if the said county should receive or collect the said taxes of and from the said defendant, the said county would repay the taxes so collected to" the company; and "that said county would sue defendant in its own name for the taxes mentioned in said petition, and in case it should collect the same, would pay them to" the company. And further, he alleged "That if said defendant refuses to pay said taxes to said county and claims that said taxes have been paid to said county through or by means of the plaintiff's assignor (the homestead company) having given or delivered the same to the county, then the defendant is bound to repay the same to plaintiff."

The defendant in each case answered the original and amended petition of Goodnow by denying every allegation therein—setting up the Statute of Limitations and charging that the homstead company "paid said taxes to said county voluntarily and without the request, knowledge, or consent of the defendant, and with full knowledge of the facts and circumstances upon which the defendant's title to said lands was founded."

To the petition of the county the defendant in each case filed an answer, and, in addition to the defenses set up to the petition of Goodnow, claimed that the county was not a party to the suit and not entitled to relief. He also further said "that all of said taxes mentioned in said petition were duly paid by the Iowa Homestead Company as soon as the same became due, and said defendant is no longer liable therefor."

Afterwards, on the third of June, 1881, each of the defendants filed in his own case an amended answer, setting up the decree in the case of Iowa Homestead Co. v. Des Moines Nav. & R. R. Co. as a bar to the action, and also insisting that the "question of title and ownership of the lands * * * was distinctly decided and determined" in the case of Wolcott v. Des Moines Nav. & R. R. Co. 72 U. S. 5 Wall. 681 [18: 689].

The Circuit Court of Webster County, in which the suit was originally begun, gave judgment for the defendants; but on appeal to the Supreme Court of the State that judgment was reversed on the grounds stated in an opinion, which is as follows:

"I. The defendant pleaded as one of its additional defenses that the plaintiff's right of recovery is barred by a prior adjudication, to wit: an adjudication in the case of Iowa Homestead Co. v. Des Moines Nav. & R. R. Co. 84 U. S. 17 Wall. 153 [21: 622]. To this plea the plaintiff replies, in substance, that if it should be conceded that the court made an adjudication in that case denying a right of recovery for the taxes in question in this case, yet this action is not barred, because a right of recovery has arisen since that time. The fact relied upon as giving such right of recovery is that the defendant now claims, as he did not then, the benefit of the payments made by the homestead company. After this action was instituted, a petition was filed in the case by Webster County, averring, among other things, that the taxes in question have never been paid by anyone, and that the same are now due to the county from the defendant. To this petition the defendant answered, averring 'that all of said taxes mentioned in said petition were duly paid by the Iowa Homestead Company, * * * and said defendant is no longer liable therefor.' The question presented is as to whether, if the payments in the first instance were officious, as we may assume was held, and the defendant for that reason was not liable, the subsequent adoption of the payments for the purpose of escaping liability to the county should be regarded as an adoption of the payment as between the defendant and plaintiff.

"If the plaintiff's assignor had made the payments in the name of the defendant as his assumed agent, any act of the defendant indicating an intention to claim the benefit of the payments would constitute a ratification of the acts by which the payments were made. But the defendant contends that the case is different where a person pays another person's debt, not under a claim of action for such person, but under the mistaken supposition that the debt is due from himself. The defendant's position is that in such case there is no act of assumed agency to ratify. It must be conceded, we think, that in one sense this is so. The plaintiff's assignor did not hold himself out as the defendant's agent; nevertheless, when the defendant claims the benefit of the payments, he elects to treat the acts of payment as done for himself. Having elected to so treat the acts, he ought not to complain if the court treats them in the same way. Natural justice certainly requires that if the defendant has the benefit of payments as discharging his liability to the county, he should reimburse the plaintiff, whose assignor made the payments. If we were to take any other view, it appears to us that we should attach more importance to the form than the substance of things. We do not overlook the fact that, under ordinary circumstances, every taxpayer has the right, as between himself and third persons, to pay his own taxes in his own way, and to pay them to the county to which they are due, and not be compelled to run after a self-substituted creditor and make payment to him. Where, therefore, such payment is made by a third person, the taxpayer has a right to ignore the payment if he chooses to do so. But if he chooses not to ignore, but to claim the benefit of it, we see no reason why we may not regard him as treating the act of payment as done for him; and, if we do so regard him, there is no difficulty in finding an implied promise to reimburse the payer or his assignee.

"We ought, perhaps, to say in this connection, that the doctrine has been announced that there can be no ratification of an act not done avowedly for the principal. Story, Ag. § 251; Fellows v. Comrs. 36 Barb. 655. But the case before us is peculiar. The act done was such that it necessarily inured to the defendant's sole benefit. Besides, the circumstances under which the act was done should not be overlooked. The defendant neglected the payment of the taxes, which was a duty of public concern. He allowed the plaintiff's assignor, under an honest claim of title to the land, to discharge this duty for several years in succession. Now, while the plaintiff is not allowed, by reason of the prior adjudication, to set up these facts as alone sufficient to create a liability on the part of the defendant, they may be considered, we think, in connection with the fact that the defendant has since claimed the benefit of the payments as sufficient to render such claim of benefit a ratification, if it otherwise would not be." Goodnow v. Stryker, 61 Iowa, 261.

The cause was then remanded to the circuit court, where a judgment was rendered, in accordance with the opinion of the supreme court, against the defendant for the amount of the taxes paid, without interest; but on a second appeal to the supreme court this judgment was modified so as to make it include interest, and a new judgment was entered in that court accordingly. Upon that judgment the writ of error in the case of Stryker was sued out.

In the case of Chapman a judgment was also rendered by the circuit court in favor of the defendant; but on appeal to the supreme court that judgment was reversed, on the same ground stated in the opinion in the case of Stryker, and a final judgment was entered in that court for the amount of the taxes paid and interest. Goodnow v. Chapman, 64 Iowa, 602. For the review of that judgment the writ of error was sued out in the case of Chapman.

In each of the cases the supreme court has certified that upon the hearing the defendant claimed immunity from the entire demand on account of the prior adjudication between him and the assignor of Goodnow in the case of Iowa Homestead Co. v. Des Moines Nav. & R. R. Co., which was denied, and also on account of the judgment in the case of Wolcott v. Des Moines Nav. & R. R. Co. which was also denied.

As to the effect of the judgment in Wolcott v. Des Moines Nav. & R. R. Co. on the rights of the parties to this suit, it is only necessary to refer to what was said on that subject in the other case of Stryker v. Crane, ante, 194, which has just been decided. The cases are identical so far as this question is concerned, and there was no error in the ruling of the supreme court thereon.

As to the decree in the case of Iowa Homestead Co. v. Des Moines Nav. & R. R. Co. the court held in effect that it was a bar to a recovery on the cause of action as it stood originally and at the time of the decree, but that since then a new cause of action had arisen, because both Chapman and Stryker had adopted the payments made by the Homestead company as payments made on their account, and from this the law implied a promise to repay what had been paid for their use. The theory of the court seems to have been that Chapman and Stryker, as owners of the land, were bound in law to the county for the payment of the taxes notwithstanding what had been done by the homestead company. When, therefore, the county sued them for the taxes and they set up the payment by the company as a defense, they made the acts of the company their own, and thus became obligated to repay what had been paid for them.

Whether this was the true legal effect of what was done is not a federal question. All we have to consider is whether it was the real ground of decision, and not used to give color only to a refusal to allow the bar of the decree. It cannot be doubted that if Chapman and Stryker had, after the rendition of the decree, got from the homestead company permission to use its payments as a defense to the actions brought against them for the taxes, and in consideration thereof had promised to repay what had been advanced for that purpose, a new cause of action would have arisen, to which the decree would not have been a bar. That is in substance what the supreme court held was done. The county sued Chapman and Stryker for the taxes which had been levied on their lands, assuming that the payments made by the homestead company did not discharge them from their liability as the true owners. To this suit Goodnow, as the assignee of the homestead company, was a party, and in his pleadings he insisted that if they refused to pay the county because his assignor had already made the payment, then they would be bound to him for the amount advanced by the company for that purpose. Such being his claim on the record, Chapman and Stryker, each in his own suit, set up as a defense "that all of said taxes * * * were duly paid by said Iowa Homestead Company as soon as the same became due, and said defendant was no longer liable therefor." This the court held to be equivalent to an election by Chapman and Stryker to treat the payments by the company as payments by themselves, and to imply a promise of reimbursement for the advances made. Whether this conclusion was correct or not depends on the tax laws of the State and the principles of general law applicable to such facts, and not on the Constitution or laws or authority of the United States. What was done was not affected by the decree because it was done afterwards. It was in the opinion of the court a new promise, as the money of the homestead company was in effect used by the defendants themselves to meet their own liabilities. The fact that the company gave the money to the county for the taxes could not of itself be made a ground of action against the defendants; because the court in the other case, to which they and the company were parties, had decided otherwise, and there had been at the time no election by them to treat this act of the company as done for them. It was only when this election was made that the liability arose, and as that was after the decree, the new liability was not affected by what had been adjudicated before. The court did not refuse to give faith and credit to the decree, but it acted upon a new cause of action with which the decree had no legal connection. That decree is a bar to the cause of action upon which it was based, but not to a different cause of action arising afterwards.

Neither can we consider whether the court below erred in allowing the county to come in as a party to the suit, and in giving judgment upon the new cause of action which arose after the original suit was begun. The question presented by the new pleadings was a real question in the case, as adjudged by the court; and the manner of getting it in is no more the subject of review here than the decision upon it afterwards.

We are aware that a right or immunity set up or claimed under the Constitution or laws of the United States may be denied as well by evading a direct decision thereon as by positive action. If a federal question is fairly presented by the record, and its decision is actually necessary to the determination of the case, a judgment which rejects the claim, but avoids all reference to it, is as much against the right, within the meaning of section 709 of the Revised Statutes, as if it had been specifically referred to and the right directly refused. But if a decision of such a question is rendered unnecessary by the view which the court properly takes of the rest of the case, within the scope of the pleadings, the judgment is not open to review here. Chouteau v. Gibson, 111 U. S. 200 [28:400]; Adams County v. Burlington & M. R. R. Co. 112 U. S. 123, 127 [28:678,680]. Such, in our opinion, were these cases, so far as the question arising out of the prior adjudication in Iowa Homestead Co. v. Des Moines Nav. & R. R. Co. is concerned. The federal question involved in that decree lay behind the alleged new promise; and as the new promise was sustained and a judgment given against the defendants on that account, the effect of the decree did not necessarily enter into the determination of the cause.

Inasmuch, therefore, as there is no federal question presented by this branch of the cases, and there was no error in the decision of that involved in the other, the judgment of the Supreme Court of Iowa in each of the cases is affirmed.

JOHN W. KEELER.

Nebraska law—sale on execution—confirmation of sale.

1. The Act of Nebraska, of Feb. 23, 1875, did not, on Dec. 2, 1875 govern proceedings for the stay of judgment in the Federal Courts of the Nebraska District, nor determine the liability of the sureties on the bond or undertaking given for such stay; and the act of the clerk, extending the judgment against the sureties in this case was without authority and void.

2. The sale under the execution, of the property of one of the sureties in this case, and the deed of the marshal to the purchaser at such sale, therefore, conferred no title.

3. The confirmation of the sale, by the order of the court, did not cure the invalidity of the execution upon which it was made; a confirmation of a sale may cure mere irregularities not affecting its fairness, but not an infirmity growing out of the nullity of the judgment under which it was had.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Nebraska. Reversed.

Statement by Mr. Justice Field:

This case comes before us from the Circuit Court for the District of Nebraska. It is an action of ejectment to recover a parcel of land in the City of Lincoln, State of Nebraska. The plaintiff below, the defendant in error here, traces title to the premises from a purchaser at a sale under an execution issued upon a judgment, extended by the clerk of the court so as to include certain sureties, and among them the defendant below. The contention of the defendant is that the extension of the judgment so as to include him was unauthorized and void, and that the execution and sale thereunder of his property was, therefore, without any force or validity.

The facts of the case, so far as it is necessary to state them for the disposition of the contention of the defendant below, are briefly these: on the 12th of November, 1875, Charles W. Seymour and William Wardell, as plaintiffs, recovered a judgment in the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Nebraska, against one William P. Young, as defendant, for $6,500 and costs. The defendant in that case, Young, being desirous of staying execution upon this judgment, obtained a bond, as the undertaking is termed, signed by five parties, of whom Lamaster, the plaintiff in error, was one, in which, after reciting the judgment recovered, they acknowledged themselves "security for the defendant for the payment of the judgment, interest and costs, from the time of rendering said judgment, until paid, to be paid nine months from the rendering the same." Attached to this instrument was an affidavit of justification of all the parties signing it, except Lamaster. Originally, his name was signed to the affidavit, but he had it cut off before the instrument was presented to the clerk. It is unnecessary to state the circumstances under which this was done or the effect of it (if any it had) upon his liability, as the case will be determined on other points.

The bond, so called, was approved by the clerk of the court, on the second of December, 1875, and filed; and thereupon he made in one of the books of record of the court, called "Judgment Index of the Court," the following entry: "Defendants, Lamaster, M. F., et al., surety; Plaintiffs, Seymour and Wardell, appearance. Docket 6, No. 138; date of judgment, Nov. 12th, 1875; amount of judgment, $6,500."

This entry was made by the clerk, under the impression that the Statute of Nebraska of February 23, 1875, entitled "An Act to Provide for Stay of Executions and Orders of Sale," was the law governing the stay of executions upon judgments in the Circuit Court of the United States. The third section of the statute provides for a stay of execution for a period of nine months, upon judgments for the recovery of money only, with certain exceptions not material in this case, on condition that the defendant shall, "within twenty days from the rendition of judgment, procure two or more sufficient freehold sureties to enter into a bond, acknowledging themselves security for the defendant for the payment of the judgment, interest and cost from the time of rendering judgment until paid."

The other sections which bear upon the questions involved are the following:

Sec. 4. "Officers approving stay bonds shall require the affidavits of the signers of such bonds, that they own real estate not exempt from execution and aside from incumbrances, to the value of twice the amount of the judgment."

Sec. 6. "The sureties for the stay of execution may be taken and approved by the clerk, and the bond shall be recorded in a book kept for that purpose, and have the force and effect of a judgment confessed from the date thereof against the property of the sureties; and the clerk shall enter and index the same in the proper judgment docket as in the case of other judgments."

Sec. 9. "At the expiration of the stay, the clerk shall issue a joint execution against the property of all the judgment debtors and sureties, describing them as debtors or sureties therein." See Neb. Laws, 1875, p. 49.

Upon the assumed sufficiency of the bond of the sureties, and of the above entry in the judgment index under the Statute of Nebraska, the clerk, on the 14th of April, 1881, issued an alias execution to the marshal of the district, commanding him as follows:

"That of the goods and chattels, and for want thereof, then of the lands and tenements of Wm. P. Young, debtor, and John I. Irwin, Jane Y. Irwin, W. T. Donovan, Milton F. Lamaster, and Nathan F. Moffit, sureties, in your district, you cause to be made the sum of $4,744.31, being the balance due April 2, A.D. 1881, on the judgment of the Circuit Court of the United States, for the District of Nebraska, at the November Term thereof, in the year 1875, by which Charles W. Seymour and William W. Wardell recovered against the said William P. Young, with interest thereon from the second day of April, A. D. 1881, until paid, together with the further sum of ——, costs of increase on said judgment, and also the costs that may accrue on this writ. And have you the said moneys before the clerk of the said circuit court, at the City of Omaha, in said district, within sixty days, to be paid to the persons entitled to receive the same."

Under this execution, the premises in controversy, being a lot in the City of Lincoln, was, on the 17th of May, 1881, sold to one Thomas Ewing for the sum of $5,600. A motion to set aside the sale having been denied, and the sale confirmed, the marshal's deed of the premises was made to the purchaser, and he conveyed them to the plaintiff.

The petition, the designation given to the first pleading, in the system of procedure in civil cases in force in Nebraska, sets forth the title of the plaintiff under the execution and sale mentioned, the detention of the premises by the defendant, and the receipt by him of the rents and profits to the amount of $3,000, and prays judgment for the possession of the premises and for the rents and profits. The defendant pleaded that the conveyance from Ewing, the purchaser at the execution sale, to the plaintiff, was colorable and collusive, for the purpose of enabling the latter to commence and maintain an action for the recovery of the property, in the Circuit Court of the United States. And in answer to the petition the defendant denied the validity of the bond, the extension of the judgment against him, and the proceedings thereunder; and also set up the pendency in the state court of a suit for the determination of his title to the premises.

Two trials of the case were had, which is permissible in actions of ejectment under the laws of Nebraska. On the first, the verdict of the jury was for the defendant; on the second, they found that the conveyance by the purchaser at the marshal's sale to Ewing, the plaintiff herein, was "merely colorable and collusive, and was made for the purpose of creating a case cognizable in the federal court, and the plaintiff was not the real party in interest; but that the action was being prosecuted for the use and benefit of Ewing, and that Keeler is only a nominal and colorable party."

This verdict being set aside by the court, a third trial was had, which resulted in a general verdict for the plaintiff, under the instructions of the court. The question raised on the trial and decided by the court, upon the instruction refused and those given, related to the validity of the proceedings taken by the clerk upon the bond of the sureties, to authorize execution against their property, and the sale of the premises.

The defendant requested the court to instruct the jury that the Statute of Nebraska respecting the stay of executions and orders of sale, approved February 23, 1875, "was not operative to authorize the execution against Lamaster's property;" but the court refused the instruction and charged the jury as follows: "That the filing of defendant's bond with the clerk of the court, and its approval by him, and his approval of the sureties thereto, including the defendant, the record of the same, the entry of memoranda thereof in the judgment index, called in the statute 'extending the judgment,' justified the issue by the clerk of the court of an execution upon the judgment of Seymour and Wardell against Young and others, directed to the marshal, commanding him to make the balance due upon the judgment out of the property of the principal and sureties, including that of the defendant Lamaster, and the sale by the marshal of the defendant's property under and by virtue of the execution, was authorized by law." And again, "that when the bond was taken by the clerk, as shown in evidence, and when the proceedings were taken thereon leading to the sale by the marshal of the property in question, the Statute of this State, passed on the 23d of February, 1875, and entitled 'An Act to Provide for Stay of Executions and Orders of Sale,' was in force in the court, and was a law therein, the same as in the district courts of the State."

And the court further instructed the jury to find a general verdict for the plaintiff.

To the refusal of the court to give the instruction requested, and to the instructions given, the defendant at the time excepted.

The jury found a verdict for the plaintiff; and to review the judgment entered thereon the defendant has brought the case here on a writ of error.

On the 30th of December, 1876, and not before, the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Nebraska made the following order:

"Ordered, that the laws of the State of Nebraska, now in force, regulating the issuing of executions and of the proceedings to be had thereon and thereunder, be, and the same are hereby, adopted as the rule of procedure to enforce the collection of judgments in the United States Circuit and District Court for said State."

Messrs. John F. Dillon, Geo. W. Doane and W. C. Goudy, for plaintiff in error:

The court below erred in not dismissing this case upon the return of said special findings and verdict.

Williams v. Nottawa, 104 U. S. 209 (26: 719); Hayden v. Manning, 106 U. S. 586 (27: 306); Bernards v. Stebbins, 109 U. S. 341 (27: 956); Farmingtan v. Pillsbury, 114 U. S. 138 (29: 114).

The court erred in admitting the testimony objected to.

Wayman v. Southard, 23 U. S. 10 Wheat. 1 (6: 253); Bank of U. S. v. Halstead, 23 U. S. 10 Wheat. 51 (6: 264); Ross v. Duval, 38 U. S. 13 Pet. 45 (10: 51); Beers v. Haughton, 34 U. S. 9 Pet. 329 (9: 145); Amis v. Smith, 41 U. S. 16 Pet. 303 (10: 973).

If there was no valid judgment upon which to base the execution, the sale thereunder was a nullity, and the court had no jurisdiction to make any order which should be binding on Lamaster.

Downs v. Fuller, 2 Met. 135; Caldwell v. Walters, 18 Pa. 79; Higgins v. Peltzer, 49 Mo. 152, Ditto v. Geoghegan, 1 Met. The court erred in refusing to give to the jury the instructions requested by the plaintiff in error.

Dair v. U. S. 83 U. S. 16 Wall. 1 (21: 491); State v. Pepper, 31 Ind. 82; Wild Cat Branch v. Ball, 45 Ind. 218; State v. Peck, 53 Me. 284; Fletcher v. Austin, 11 Vt. 447; Pawling v. U. S. 8 U. S. 4 Cranch, 219 (2: 601); People v. Bostwick, 32 N. Y. 445.

The court erred in giving to the jury the instructions requested by the defendant in error.

Wayman v. Southard, Bank of U. S. v. Halstead, and Amis v. Smith, supra.

There was no valid judgment against Lamaster.

Nudd v. Burrows, 91 U. S. 426 (23: 286); Indianapolis & St. L. R. R. Co. v. Horst, 93 U. S. 291 (23: 898).

The Circuit Court of Nebraska had no power to adopt the State Statute of 1875, authorizing a stay of execution for nine months upon the execution of a bond; and there was no power in the clerk to approve of such a bond, or extend any judgment against the sureties signing it.

Wayman v. Southard, and Bank of U. S. v. Halstead, supra; Kearoy v. Farmers & M. Bank, 41 U. S. 16 Pet. 89 (10: 897); McCracken v. Hayward, 43 U. S. 2 How. 608 (11: 897); Davenport v. U. S. 76 U. S. 9 Wall. 409 (19: 704); Duncan v. Darst, 42 U. The decision of the Circuit Court of Nebraska, denying the motion of Lamaster to set aside the sale, does not prevent him from litigating the questions arising upon that motion.

S. 248 (29:388); Nashville v. Cooper, 73 U. S. 6 Wall. 247 (18: 851).

The contention of the plaintiff below, the defendant in error here, that the Act of Nebraska of February 23, 1875, governed proceedings for the stay of money judgments in the Federal Courts of the Nebraska District equally as for the stay of such judgments in the courts of that State, and in like manner determined the liability of sureties upon bonds given for such stay, is founded upon the language of section 914 of the Revised Statutes, which is as follows:

"The practice, pleadings, and forms and modes of proceeding in civil causes, other than equity and admiralty causes, in the circuit and district courts, shall conform, as near as may be, to the practice, pleadings, and forms and modes of proceeding existing at the time in like causes in the courts of record of the State within which such circuit or district courts are held, any rule of court to the contrary notwithstanding."

This section is a re-enactment of section 5 of the Act of June 1, 1872, "to further the administration of justice" (17 Stat. at L. chap. 255), and was intended to assimilate the pleadings and the procedure in common-law cases in the federal courts to the pleadings and procedure used in such cases in the courts of record of the State within which the federal courts are held. Much inconvenience had been previously felt by the profession from the dissimilarity in pleadings, forms, and modes of procedure of the federal courts from those in the courts of the State, consequent upon the general adherence of the former to the common-law forms of actions, pleadings, and modes of procedure; whilst the distinctions in such forms of action and the system of pleading and the modes of procedure peculiar to them had been in many States abrogated by statute. The new codes of procedure did not require an accurate knowledge of the intricacies of common-law pleading; and to obviate the embarrassment following the use of different systems in the two courts the section mentioned of the Act of 1872 was adopted. As said by this court in the case of Nudd v. Burrows, 91 U. S. 426, 441 [23: 286, 290] its purpose "was to bring about uniformity in the law of procedure in the federal and state courts of the same locality. It had its orgin in the code enactments of many of the States. While in the federal tribunals the common-law pleadings, forms, and practice were adhered to, in the state courts of the same district the simpler forms of the local Code prevailed. This involved the necessity, on the part of the Bar, of studying two distinct systems of remedial law, and of practicing according to the wholly dissimilar requirements of both. The inconvenience of such a state of things is obvious. The evil was a serious one. It was the aim of the provision in question to remove it. This was done by bringing about the conformity in the courts of the United States which it prescribes."

The general language of the section, in the absence of qualifying provisions, would comprehend all proceedings in a cause from its commencement to its conclusion, embracing enforcement of the judgment therein. The court which has jurisdiction of a cause has jurisdiction over the various proceedings which may be taken therein, from its initiation to the satisfaction of the judgment rendered. Any practice, pleading, form, or mode of proceeding which may be applicable in any stage of a cause in a state court would therefore, under the section in question, in the absence of other clauses, be also applicable in a like stage of a similar cause in a federal court. The section would embrace proceedings after judgment equally within those preceding its rendition.

The first Process Act of Congress, passed September 29, 1789, 1 Stat. at L. 93, provided "That until further provision shall be made * * * the forms of writs and executions, except their style, and modes of process * * * in the circuit and district courts, in suits at common law, shall be the same in each State respectively as are now used or allowed in the supreme courts of the same."

The second Process Act, passed May 8, 1792, 1 Stat. at L. 275, provided "That the forms of writs, executions and other process, except their style and the forms and modes of proceeding in suits in those of common law shall be the same as are now used in the said courts respectively in pursuance of the Act, entitled 'An Act to Regulate Processes in the Courts of the United States,'" the first process Act mentioned above.

In Wayman v. Southard, 23 U. S. 10 Wheat. 1 [6: 253] these statutes were considered and construed by this court. And in giving a meaning to the language "forms and modes of proceeding in suits," the court, speaking by Chief Justice Marshall, said that it "Embraces the whole progress of the suit, and every transaction in it, from its commencement to its termination, which has been already shown not to take place until the judgment shall be satisfied. It may then and ought to be understood as prescribing the conduct of the officer in the execution of process, that being a part of the proceedings in the suit." Id. 32 [260].

There would, therefore, be good reason for the contention of the plaintiff below, that the general words of section 914 of the Revised Statutes, "forms and modes of proceeding," apply to proceedings for the enforcement of judgments, as well as to proceedings before the judgments were rendered, but for the provisions of section 916, which is section 6 of the same Act of June 1, 1872, from which section 914 was taken. Section 916 is as follows:

"The party recovering a judgment in any common-law cause, in any circuit or district court, shall be entitled to similar remedies upon the same, by execution or otherwise, to reach the property of the judgment debtor, as are now provided in like causes by the laws of the State in which such court is held, or by any such laws hereafter enacted which may be adopted by general rules of such circuit or district court; and such courts may, from time to time, by general rules, adopt such state laws as may hereafter be in force in such State in relation to remedies upon judgments, as aforesaid, by execution or otherwise."

This section shows that in pursuing the remedies for the enforcement of a judgment in a common-law cause, recovered in a federal court, the "forms and modes of proceeding" provided for the enforcement of a like judgment in a state court are not to be followed, unless they were prescribed by a law of the State, at the time the provisions of the section took effect; or, if subsequently prescribed by such law, until they have been adopted by a general rule of the court. In providing for remedies upon judgments, the section not only excludes the application of the provisions of section 914 to such remedies, but also indicates the extent to which remedies upon judgments furnished by state laws may be used in the federal courts. Congress, which alone can determine the remedies which may be pursued for the enforcement of judgments in the federal courts, as well as the procedure to be adopted in the progress of a suit, has declared its will with respect to both. The procedure in civil causes, other than those in equity and admiralty, from their commencement to final judgment, must conform, as near as may be, to the procedure existing at the time in like causes in the courts of record of the State in which the federal courts are held. It must, therefore, follow subsequent changes in the procedure in like causes in the state courts. But to enforce judgments in common-law causes, only such remedies can be pursued "as are now provided in like causes by the laws of the State"—that is, when the Act of Congress on the subject, the above section, was passed or re-enacted—or, if provided by subsequent laws of the State, such as have been adopted by the federal courts.

It matters not that the remedies designated in section 916 are stated to be, to reach by execution or otherwise the property of the judgment debtor; and that proceedings under the Stay Law of Nebraska are only to secure, where a stay is obtained, the personal liability of the sureties for the amount of the judgment—in the absence of a designation of any other remedies, the section is a declaration that, until adopted by a rule of the court, no other remedies prescribed by state laws shall be permitted in the federal courts. The extent to which the authority of the federal courts may go, in the enforcement of judgments, by resort to remedies provided by state laws in similar cases, is thus defined and limited.

Section 916, as mentioned, is taken from the Act of Congress of June 1, 1872, and is re-enacted in the Revised Statutes, which took effect as of December 1, 1873. The Act of Nebraska of February 23, 1875, had not been adopted by any rule of the federal court when the judgment of Seymour v. Young was rendered in the Circuit Court of the United States, November 12, 1875, or when that judgment was extended by the clerk of that court, December 2, 1875, so as to embrace the sureties on the bond given to stay execution. That Act was not adopted as a rule of procedure of that court until December 30, 1876.

It follows from this construction of the two sections 914 and 916 that the Act of Nebraska did not govern proceedings for the stay of execution upon that judgment, or determine the liability of the sureties on the bond or undertaking given for such stay; and that the act of the clerk extending that judgment against the sureties was without authority and void. The sale, under the execution of the property of Lamaster, one of the sureties, and the deed of the marshal to the purchaser at such sale, therefore, conferred no title.

The confirmation of the sale by the order of the court did not cure the invalidity of the execution upon which it was made. The extension of the judgment against Young, so as to embrace the sureties, being a void proceeding, no subsequent action upon the sale could give it validity. A confirmation of a sale may cure mere irregularities not affecting its fairness, but not an infirmity growing out of the nullity of the judgment under which it was had.

The judgment below must therefore be reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial; and it is so ordered.

General exception — charge to jury — money, when not recoverable — illegal contract.

1. A general exception to the whole of a charge to the jury cannot be regarded, as it is a violation of Rule 4 of this court.

2. A charge to the jury, which presented fairly to them a statement of the testimony on both sides and which fairly submitted to them the question whether the contracts in question in this action were contracts to buy or sell at a future day, or were absolute sales, and which instructed them that if they should find that the dealings of the defendant for the plaintiff were options to buy or sell at a future day, their verdict should be for the plaintiff, but if they should find such dealings were contracts for absolute delivery of the grain, their verdict should be for the defendant, held, in this case, not to have been erroneous.

3. Moneys irrevocably set apart, by both the plaintiff and his agent, the defendant, for the payment of damages upon contracts for the purchase of wheat, and paid over by such agent in satisfaction of such damages, under the rules of the board of trade, cannot, under the circumstances of this case, be recovered back by the plaintiff.

4. A party who has paid out his money for the accomplishment of a purpose made an offense by the law, and upon a contract which was illegal, criminal and void, cannot recover it back, in a court whose duty it is to give effect to the law which the party admits he intended to violate.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of the United States for the Northern District of Illinois. (No. 73.) Affirmed.

Statement of the case by Mr. Justice Blatchford:

The first one of these cases is an action at law brought on the 10th of May, 1883, by James B. White against George M. Barber, in the Superior Court of Cook County, Illinois. The declaration demanded the sum of $15,000 and declared on the common counts. The defendant pleaded non assumpsit. In June, 1883, the cause was removed by the defendant into the Circuit Court of the United States for the Northern District of Illinois. At the trial, in February, 1884, there was a verdict for the defendant, followed by a judgment for him, to review which the plaintiff has brought a writ of error. There was a bill of exceptions, the whole of which is in substance as follows:

The plaintiff introduced the following evidence: James B. White, the plaintiff, "testified, that now, and during the time in question, he resided at Fort Wayne, Indiana, engaged in the business of dealing in general merchandise; that, in 1879 and prior thereto, one A. S. Maltman, of Chicago, acted as his agent in purchasing and forwarding merchandise of various kinds; that, about September, 1879, desiring to do some trading on the board of trade, Chicago, I asked Maltman to recommend some good responsible broker on the board of trade, through whom I could do business; that Maltman recommended the defendant, who then, and during the time in question, was a broker residing in Chicago and doing business on the board of trade; that thereupon I commenced trading on the board, sending my orders at first to Maltman, who communicated them to the defendant; that about December, 1879, I came to Chicago, made the acquaintance of defendant, and thereafter did business directly with him; that I continued to do business with defendant during the years 1879, 1880, 1881, and 1882, buying and selling on the board, through the defendant as broker, corn, wheat, oats, pork, and other commodities; and that, about April 19th, 1882, I had a settlement with defendant, in which all previous dealings were adjusted; that up to this time the transactions which I had made through defendant on the board amounted to $105,000, in 1879; $1,718,000 in 1880; $640,000, in 1881, and $672,000, in 1882; that, in November or December, 1879, and at other times prior to the settlement in April, 1882, I had conversations with the defendant in which I told defendant that I was a merchant in Fort Wayne, and did not want it known that I was engaged in speculating on the board of trade in Chicago, as it might affect my credit, and that the account could be kept in the name of A. S. Maltman; that I considered it a hazardous business, but was willing to gamble provided I could have a fair show; that I wanted my deals placed with responsible parties, so that I could get my money when I made it; that I didn't want any of the property, but meant simply to do a gambling business; that defendant told me (plaintiff) that he knew what I wanted; that Maltman had explained my situation and business; that he would deal only with responsible parties, and the deals should be settled so as to get the profits or losses; that defendant told me (plaintiff) that not one bushel in a million that was bought and sold on the board was legitimate business; that a few of the large houses did some legitimate business, but most of it was simply trading in differences; that he (defendant) did nothing but business of the latter kind; that he dealt mostly for himself; that he did a good deal of 'scalping,' deals made and closed the same day, on the turn of the market; that he did not let his deals run over night; that, up to April, 1882, I (plaintiff) never delivered or received any of the property so sold or bought, nor was anything ever said by defendant to me about receiving or delivering the property or making arrangements to do so; that, from time to time, defendant rendered statements to me (plaintiff) showing the deals made, the price per bushel, or, in case of pork, the price per 100 lbs., at which the commodity was bought and sold, the difference in dollars and cents, the commissions charged, and the total debit or credit passed to my account; that all the deals made, were, in form, contracts for future delivery, in which the seller had the option of delivering at any time during some future month; that, up to April, 1882, all trades made by defendant for me (plaintiff) had been settled or closed by counter trades prior to the month in which delivery could be made; up to April 19, 1882, no commodities had been delivered to or received on these trades, nor had any suggestion or requirement on the part of Mr. Barber to deliver been made; that defendant never reported to me the names of the parties with whom trades were made on my account, and that I never knew or inquired who such parties were; that, after the settlement in April, I commenced selling wheat for July delivery, and, by the last of May, had sold, through defendant, 100,000 bushels for that delivery, which are the trades in question in this case; that there was a corner in July wheat, and the price was forced up ten or twelve cents; that, on the last of July, I came to Chicago, had an interview with defendant in the morning, in which he (defendant) proposed to make a tender of No. 2 red winter wheat, the kind sold being No. 2 spring wheat; that No. 2 red winter is intrinsically more valuable than No. 2 spring, but that, on the last of July, the former stood at 98 cents per bushel and the latter at $1.35 to $1.37; that I (plaintiff) knew of the tender and I did not object; that I met defendant later in the day, and was informed by him that he had borrowed warehouse receipts for ten thousand bushels No. 2 red winter wheat, and had made a tender of the same to the several parties to whom he had sold the wheat, and that such tender was in every case declined, and that said tender was made under the following rules of the board of trade, viz.: 'On contracts for grain for future delivery the tender of the higher grade of the same kind of grain as the one contracted for shall be deemed sufficient, provided the higher grade of grain tendered shall not be of a color or quality that will depreciate the value of the other, if mixed.'

"Prior to December, 1879, I bought through defendant, 100,000 bushels of corn for December delivery. I came to Chicago and defendant told me the deal had gone against me $4,500, and he said I had to close it that day. The loss was that amount, and I paid it that day. No corn was delivered on either side. In January, 1880, I sold, through Barber, 20,000 bushels of wheat. My profit was $400. I did not take the profit, but sold more, and the deal went against me $2,000, and I paid it up. I then commenced buying, and made $600 on March wheat bought in January. I commenced selling wheat in March, 1880, and made a good deal of money for a few months; recovered losses in April and commenced selling May wheat. The May options took a sudden start up, and I lost $8,000, and I paid it. It was expressly stated by me to Barber that I wanted no property. He knew that. He said, 'Certainly, I know that,' and that the deals should be settled on the margins—on the profits. Up to April, 1882, nothing had been delivered by me or received by me, nor had there been any suggestion or requirement on defendant's part to deliver made; on the other hand, it was never expected to handle the property, but merely to trade in the different deals. Up to the close of the July deal, 1882, no demand had been made on me by Barber for the delivery of wheat or corn, or any other commodity.

"That I received the following statement of account from defendant about the day of its date (which was read in evidence):

"That the item of $12,000 balance in said account consisted of money advanced and paid to the defendant; that the item of 'July 3, by draft $3,000,' consisted of $3,000 money paid the defendant by means of a draft. Plaintiff testified further that on April 2, 1883, I served the following notice upon the defendant, by delivering to him a copy thereof; the defendant read the notice, admitted he had the money in his hands, but declined to pay it over.

"The notice was offered in evidence, and is as follows:

'To G. M. Barber, Esq.:

'In a statement made by you, dated October 30, 1882, of deals made on my account on the board of trade, Chicago, you acknowledged a balance in your hands of $11,412.50 in my favor, being, so the statement says, the difference between price you sold 100 M July wheat for me and the selling price of same as fixed by the board of trade, $1.35, including your commission of ⅛ cent; now you are hereby notified that I claim all contracts for sale of said wheat to be illegal and void, and forbid you to pay over any part of said money or balance to anyone, and I further demand the immediate payment thereof to myself.

'Dated Chicago, April 2nd, 1883.

"On cross examination plaintiff testified that, during all the time he traded through defendant, Maltman continued to some extent to act as his agent in the business with defendant; that he received some profits debited to him in the statement offered in evidence; that defendant complied with his orders, so far as he knows; that he didn't think defendant had anything to do with the corner in wheat; that he (plaintiff) had nothing to do with the appointment of a committee by the board to fix a selling price for July wheat; that he knew what was going on, and talked with A. M. Wright and other members of the board of trade about the deal, but did not enter into any agreement or arrangement with the other brokers similarly situated to the defendant in regard to legal proceedings to prevent the consummation of the corner; did not employ counsel on behalf of defendant, or authorize any steps to be taken in his name; that he (plaintiff) was an outsider and was not recognized in that matter; that he did not agree to pay attorney's fees, but expected he would have to do so, and did after the litigation was over; that he knew a bill was filed; that the matter was contested and decided by the supreme court in favor of the cornerers. The litigation was after a committee appointed by the board had fixed the selling price at $1.35.

"In the progress of the case the plaintiff testified further, among other things: I left it for Mr. Barber to put the contract in form when I wished him to buy or sell. I understood that he would go on the board of trade and either buy or sell, and I understood that he did go on the board of trade and buy and sell according to my orders. There was no disobedience of my orders, so far as I know. I have no complaint to make on the score of nonobservance of my orders. I knew that while we thought the corner in July wheat was about to culminate, buying wheat at Milwaukee or elsewhere to fill orders was talked about—a great many talked of it—but it was considered that parties who attempted that got beaten, because they simply dropped the grade on them. It is possible I may have talked with Maltman about the possibility of buying wheat in Milwaukee to fill my orders, but I never dreamed of it. I said some were doing it; some did do it. It was generally talked that some people had done it, and as to the propriety of doing it; it was only three cents, I think, to bring it from Milwaukee here, and twelve, fifteen, or twenty cents, somewhere along there, lower a bushel, and they could fill their contracts here with it and not lose so much as they would in the extortion of the corner. I might have said, 'Well, it could be done,' 'I wish I could do it,' or something of that kind. I knew Barber being a member of the board of trade and making contracts on the board for me, would be obliged to observe the rules of the board. I understood there was a rule that one must keep his margin good. I told him to buy, and told him to sell, and told him to sell out, and when to cover and when to close trades, and he observed my orders. If there was any corner it was not my fault, as I was selling, and it was not from Barber's fault, so far as I know. After he made the tender of red winter wheat on the 31st of July, 1882, I approved of what he did. I went to see Mr. A. M. Wright, who was one of the parties proposing to file a bill to question the propriety or binding force of a finding of a committee of the board of trade fixing the settling price for July wheat. I saw published a communication in the paper, an interview with the reporter, in regard to this corner, or at least he published a communication and I went to see him and consulted with him about it. The complaint was that the price of July wheat was put too high on the 31st of July. Barber had spoken about the contracts being under the board of trade rules. After the culmination of the corner I got a copy of the rules—printed copy. He showed me the rules under which the committee was appointed. I think the rule is on page 51 of Rules of 1882, sec. 3. Mr Wright believed it was a legal tender; so did I. I believed that 'red' would be a good tender. I went to see counsel; it was John E. Burke. He was a lawyer who had charge of what he called contested cases. There were some thirty-two members of the board in contested cases, and Mr. Barber joined in with them. I footed the lawyer's bill; that was all I did. I told Mr. Burke that I was one of the fellows that got bled in this affair, and I did not want to stand it if he could help it. He was seemingly as much out of humor about it as I was, as far as the situation was concerned—the unfairness of it. When it came to pay for the expense of those legal proceedings, the bills were presented to Mr. Barber and Mr. Maltman, and I told them to pay them, and I would pay them back; and I did. I went with Mr. Wright to Mr. Burke. Mr. Barber was away from home at the time. I told Mr. Burke the situation I was in, and he said, 'Well, when your broker comes here have him come up and see me.' It was understood that Mr. Barber was my broker or commission merchant, and, when he returned, he went and joined in with the others, to contest this thing. I knew how the matter progressed after that. It was contested in the courts in some formal way, to get into the supreme court. There was a pro forma decision in the court here, and the case was taken to the supreme court and was there determined in favor of the cornerers. That was after the committee of the board of trade appointed under these rules had been appointed. The case went to the supreme court.

We simply had to have patience to wait until they determined it. They determined it about a year ago last January—that is, in January, 1883—before I had served notice on him. In most cases where I bought or sold I closed before the end of the month in some way—either sold out or covered it. If I bought wheat of a man for the month of July he had the whole month of July in which to tender to me. During the whole of the month of July I had an option at what time I would deliver. The buyer has to close his trade the first of the month; and the seller has to the last of the month, or, if he pleases, he can close between times.

"George M. Barber, defendant, who, being first duly sworn, testified as follows: That, after the notice was served upon him, by plaintiff, in April, 1883, he paid over to the various parties to whom he had owed the wheat in question, the sum of $11,412.50, less the amount of his commissions, which were $250; and, on cross examination, that he made such payment because charges had been preferred against him, and he had to pay or be suspended from the board.

"Plaintiff here rested his case, and the defendant, to maintain the issues on his part, introduced the following:

"George M. Barber, defendant, who, being recalled, testified that he was a commission merchant and member of the board of trade; that he was employed by Maltman to trade for plaintiff on the board of trade—to make trades there; that, in executing the orders of plaintiff, he dealt with other members of the board; that he did not seek commission business, but dealt mostly on his own account; that once, when White was hanging on to a deal which had gone against him, witness told him that witness never hung on to a deal, but, in his own trades, generally calculated when he went home at night to have an equal amount bought and sold, so that he would not be affected by the fluctuations of the market, but did not say to Mr. White that White's business would be conducted in that way. Witness had to be governed by White's orders, which were to do so and so; did not recollect plaintiff saying that he wanted to gamble on the board; that the manner of making trades on the board is as follows: If the order was to sell, he would go on the board and offer to sell so much wheat at such a price, and some other broker would accept the offer, or some other broker might offer to buy, and he (defendant) would accept the offer, and thereupon both parties made a memorandum of the trade on a card, without comparison; that such memorandum was usually as follows, (referring to a card,) this being one of the trades in question: '10 M, July, H. G. Gaylord, 1.25¼, J. B. W.; 'that this was the only writing made in the hurry of business on the board; that '10 M' meant 10,000 bushels; 'July' meant for delivery in July, at the seller's option; that No. 2 spring wheat was understood; that 'H. G. Gaylord' was the name of the broker to whom the sale was made; that '1.25¼' denoted the price, and the initials 'J. B. W.' indicated that the sale was on account of plaintiff; that their trades were afterwards, on the same day, entered on the books of the espective parties, and their clerks went round and compared and checked them off; that this was the case with the sales of 100,000 bushels for delivery at seller's option during July, 1882, (the deals under consideration); that he had no different agreement with any of the persons with whom he dealt for plaintiff; that the grain was to be delivered or received; that 'puts' and 'calls,' or mere options to buy or sell, were not recognized on the board; that it is customary where a commodity is sold to and bought of the same broker, upon different orders, for the brokers to settle their trades by paying the difference, as the case may be. (And a rule of the board of trade allowing such transfers was read in evidence.) That he never told plaintiff that trading on the board was illegitimate, but may have told him many other of the trades were settled up, or offset, without delivery. The volume of transactions was too large to make delivery practicable in all cases. As to the conversation between witness and White, November 30, 1879, witness stated he believed it was the first time he met White, for whom there were then to mature contracts to buy 100,000 bushels corn, and witness told White that the chances were strong that the corn would be delivered, and he must either furnish the money to pay for it or order him to sell it, so that he would have a place to put it, when delivered, or make arrangements to transfer it; that, in the contracts for Mr. White, witness had received and delivered property; had received as high as 60,000 bushels in a day; that, at the request of plaintiff, he did not settle the deals for July, but made default as to the 100,000 bushels. Mr. Maltman, for Mr. White, gave me the draft of $5,000, June 12, 1882. I was required to give my word that I would not buy in the wheat unless by his orders, but would allow him to default, and Maltman told me that White said he would settle—let the committee fix the price and he would settle that way, if possible, if he did not decide to buy in the wheat. White sent witness a telegram from Fort Wayne, Aug. 5, 1882, as follows: 'Don't cancel the July trades. My attorneys here believe the tender we made is good and can be enforced. J. B. White. (Telegram read in evidence.) There were about thirty other brokers who made default; that a committee was appointed in accordance with the rules of the board, who fixed the settling price at $1.35; that thereupon the brokers filed bills in court, to enjoin the board from suspending them for not settling at the price fixed by the committee; that he returned to the city about September 10th, 1882, after being absent a month or more, and was informed by Maltman that the plaintiff had made arrangements for him to join in the injunction proceedings; that the next day he went to the office of J. E. Burke, the attorney for the defaulting brokers, and signed and swore to a bill for the purpose above stated; that said bill was filed; that afterwards the supreme court rendered a decision adverse to the prayer of the bill, and the bill was dismissed; that plaintiff was informed of the result, and paid the attorney's fees and damages in the case; that plaintiff did not suggest the making of any further contest; that at the time plaintiff made the demand upon him, April 2, 1883, the money in question was under his control, except $6,700, which had been deposited in the bank as margins, on account of some of the deals; that he frequently received and delivered grain; had received as high as 60,000 bushels in a day; that he could not recall any trade in which he bought for Mr. White where he received any commodity, but had no doubt at all in all his tradings he did receive a good deal, but could not recall any particular instance. There was a certainty that delivery would be made, unless, after the trades were made, I made offsets. I always do get more or less; do not expect it will all be delivered. I expect I can offset trades with a good part of it. When the 100,000 bushels in question were sold, witness expected it would be delivered; that he would buy here in the market, the largest grain market in the world.

"Thomas W. Burns, being duly sworn, testified for the defendant, that, in 1882, he was a member of the firm of Ulrich, Busch & Co. and a broker on the board of trade; that on May 17, 1882, he bought of defendant, for his firm '5, July, wheat, at 1.24⅛,' No. 2 spring wheat, (5,000 bushels); that the contract was made in the regular way; that there was no secret understanding or agreement that it was not to be executed, or that it was to be settled; that the wheat was to be delivered at any time in July, at the seller's option.

Abel H. Bliss, being duly sworn, testified for defendant, that he was a member of the board of trade, and was doing business as a commission merchant in 1882; that in May he bought 10,000 bushels July wheat, (No. 2 spring, deliverable at seller's option at any time during July) of defendant, which he never received; the wheat was to be delivered in July, at the seller's option; that there was no agreement that the wheat was not to be delivered, or that it was to be settled; that he certainly expected to get the wheat.

"It was admitted that the other brokers to whom defendant had sold the wheat in question would testify in a similar way, as to the trades with them, respectively.

"Alexander S. Maltman, being sworn, testified for defendant, that he was of the firm of A. S. Maltman & Co., and was engaged in the commission business in Chicago; that he acted as agent for plaintiff, in his transactions with defendant; that he never told defendant that the transactions were to be of a gambling or fictitious character; that his instructions from plaintiff were for the most part contained in telegrams and letters, and these he gave or showed to defendant; that the transactions were quite continuous; that, in July, 1882, he had several conversations with plaintiff as to Barber defaulting; that, when the price was up in the thirties, plaintiff was unwilling to advance more margins unless defendant would agree to default, and that he procured such an agreement from the defendant at the request of plaintiff; that, after default had been made, plaintiff said he was willing to leave it with the committee to be appointed by the board; that he went with plaintiff to the office of Burke, the attorney; that plaintiff went there to get out an injunction to prevent the board of trade from suspending defendant; that he paid out for the plaintiff on account of the said suit $283.50, which plaintiff had repaid him.

"George F. Morcom, who, being duly sworn, testified for defendant, that he was of the firm of A. S. Maltman & Co.; that he heard plaintiff say that the tender of No. 2 red winter wheat was good, that, according to their own rules, they were bound to accept it; that plaintiff said that he desired Mr. Barber to default on the deals and let the matter go to a committee and let them fix the price, and said that he would see that Mr. Barber was protected.

"Deville C. Bannister, being duly sworn, testified for defendant, that, during the time in question, he was bookkeeper for defendant; that plaintiff, at the time the injunctions were being obtained, went to Mr. Burke's office to see about the matter, and said he wished he would take the matter into his own hands; that Mr. Barber did not pay over the money until it was necessary to do so in order to save himself from being suspended from the board.

"The bill in chancery above referred to, being a bill filed in the Superior Court of Cook County, by George M. Barber, in the interest of or for the benefit of the plaintiff, on the 11th of September, 1882, making the Board of Trade of the City of Chicago party defendant, was, together with a copy of the injunction issued in pursuance of the writ, read in evidence. It set forth certain sections of the charter of the board of trade, and referred to a copy of the rules of said board in force January 1, 1882, making such copy a part of the bill as an exhibit, and referred also to sales of number 2 spring wheat, made by defendant for delivery in July, 1882, and alleged that there was an unlawful combination to prevent the complainant and others situated like him from fulfilling their contracts, etc., and set forth a certain rule of the board of trade providing, among other things, for the appointment of a committee to determine disputes as to the price of property, in case of supposed excessive claims for damages being made under contracts, on default, etc., and showed that application for the appointment of such committee was made with reference to the defaults made upon contracts for delivery of No. 2 spring wheat in July, 1882, and showed that the committee determined the price for settlement at $1.35 per bushel; and the decision of the committee was drawn in question by the bill upon various grounds, not drawing in question the validity of the contracts, but questioning whether the board of trade had power to compel members to abide the decision of such committee, and also questioning the regularity of the appointment of the committee, and charging that, in the conduct of the hearing had before the committee, and in the finding of the committee, the spirit of the rules of the board of trade was violated by putting it in the power of persons who had been concerned in cornering the market to get excessive damages, etc. The bill pointed out certain rules of the board of trade under which, in case a member failed to comply promptly with the terms of any business contract or obligation, or failed to satisfy, adjust, and settle the contract, or failed to comply with or fulfill any award of the committee of arbitration, or committee of appeals, made in conformity with the rules, regulations, and by-laws of the association, he should, upon admission or proof of the delinquency before the board of directors, be subject to be suspended from all privileges of the association, etc.; and an injunction to prevent suspension or expulsion, and especially to restrain and enjoin the board from accepting, treating, or recognizing the decision of the committee aforesaid as in force, or as having any effect, was prayed for by the bill. Such injunction was ordered, and was issued September 11, 1882, and was served on the board. There was also introduced a certified transcript of the order of said superior court, made on the 11th of October, 1882, dissolving the injunction, and assessing damages on account of the issuing of the same, but showing that by stipulation the cause was to abide the final result of the case of Wright v. Board of Trade of Chicago, in the appellate court or in the supreme court, and that, in cases of the reversal of the decree in that case, then the decree in the Barber case should be set aside on his motion, and the injunction in his favor was continued. This decree was to be regarded as final in case the decree in the Wright case should be affirmed, except that, in such case, the injunction was to be dissolved, on defendant's motion. The transcript further showed that, on the 16th of April, 1883, the said superior court, in the said chancery suit of Barber, vacated the order to continue the injunction, and the bill thereupon stood dismissed under the previous order of the court, this being because the supreme court had, in the case of Wright, affirmed the decree of the superior court dismissing his bill. It appeared that, after the decision of the Wright case, inquiry was made of the plaintiff as to whether he wished anything further done in reference to the prosecution of the chancery suit in the name of Barber, and he replied: 'Further appearance not necessary.'

"It further appearing, from the testimony, that the plaintiff paid the damages which were assessed against Barber on account of the issuing of the injunction, the testimony of the witness Barber tended to show that, at the time of the delivery by defendant to the plaintiff of the statement aforesaid, dated October 30th, 1882, the balance of $11,412.50 therein mentioned, that amount being the difference between the price at which the one hundred thousand bushels of wheat were sold for July delivery, and $1.35 per bushel, the settling price so fixed by the committee—that is, the difference over and above the commissions of ⅛ of a cent per bushel charged by the defendant—was to remain with the defendant, to await the action of the court upon the aforesaid bill in equity, seeking to impeach the decision of the committee fixing the settling price, and that, after that matter had been litigated in the courts, through the suit so brought in favor of Wright, which was made a test case, complaints were made before the board of directors of the board of trade, against the defendant, on account of default on his part in performing or settling the contracts for the sale of the said one hundred thousand bushels of wheat, notice of one or more of which complaints were given by defendant to plaintiff; and the defendant appeared before the directors to make defense, but did not succeed in making any defense, and, being about to be suspended unless he settled, did thereupon settle by paying according to the decision of the committee declaring $1.35 per bushel to be the settling price, so that the moneys paid out by defendant, together with his commission, exhausted the said sum of $11,412.50; and this was prior to the commencement of this suit, but after the notice of April 2, 1883, above set forth; the testimony tended to show that this money was left in defendant's hands by Mr. White, when the aforesaid statement of account stating said balance, etc., was given by defendant to the plaintiff, and was so left for the protection of the defendant, as to the contracts, with reference to the litigation arising as to whether the decision of the committee should be allowed to be binding in regard to the settling price."

On the foregoing evidence, the plaintiff claimed to recover the before named sum of $11,412.50, as money placed by him in the hands of the defendant for the purpose of dealing in gambling contracts at the Chicago Board of Trade, and which contracts, it was asserted, were made illegal by a Statute of Illinois.

The court charged the jury, among other things, as follows: "The question of fact for you to determine under the proof is whether these dealings made by the plaintiff on the Board of Trade, through the defendant, as his broker, were gambling contracts, within the meaning of the law. The Statute of the State of Illinois upon the subject I will now read you. Section 130, chap. 38" (Rev. Stat. of Illinois, by Hurd, ed. of 1883, p. 394; ed. of 1885, p. 405), "reads as follows: 'Whoever contracts to have or give to himself or another the option to sell or buy, at a future time, any grain, or other commodity, stock of any railroad or other company, or gold, or forestalls the market by spreading false rumors to influence the price of commodities therein, or corners the market, or attempts to do so in relation to any of such commodities, shall be fined not less than $10 nor more than $1,000, or confined in the county jail not exceeding one year, or both; and all contracts made in violation of this section shall be considered gambling contracts, and shall be void.' The plaintiff contends that the contracts in question, made by the defendant for him and in his behalf, were gambling contracts, within the meaning of this law. The question then arises, What kind of contracts are prohibited by this statute? You will notice the language is, 'Whoever contracts to have or give to himself or another the option to sell or buy, at a future time'—an option to sell or buy at a future time. The courts have construed to some extent the meaning of this statute, and I will read from a case decided by the supreme court of this State the construction which is there given upon it: 'The evidence in this record is by no means conclusive that the contracts for grain, made by defendants for plaintiff, were unlawful. They were made in the regular course of business, and, for anything that appears in this record, they could have been enforced in the courts. It is true, they were time contracts—that is, the seller had all of the month in which to deliver the grain; but the testimony of Wolcott is, they were bona fide contracts for the actual purchase of the grain. The only option the seller had was as to the time of delivery. The obligation was to deliver the grain at all events; but it was the seller's privilege or option to deliver it at any time before the closing of business on the last day of the month. Time contracts, made in good faith, for the future delivery of grain or any other commodity, are not prohibited by the common law nor any statute of this State, nor by any policy beneficial to the public welfare. Such a restraint would limit commercial transactions to such a degree as could not but be prejudicial to the best interests of trade. Our present statute was not in force when these dealings were had; consequently, the rights of the parties are not affected by it. What the law prohibits, and what is deemed detrimental to the public interests, is speculations in differences in market values, called, perhaps, in the peculiar language of the dealers, 'puts' and 'calls,' which simply means a privilege to deliver or receive the grain, or not, at the seller's or buyer's option. It is against such fictitious gambling transactions, we apprehend, the penalties of the law are leveled.'" The above extract is taken from the opinion of the Supreme Court of Illinois in Wolcott v. Heath, 78 Ill. 433. The circuit court then proceeded in its charge as follows: "Now, the question is, in the light of the testimony in this case, whether the contracts in question in this case were contracts to buy or sell at a future day, or whether they were simply absolute sales, in which the seller had the entire month, the month specified, in which to perform his contract. This court has found it necessary, on several occasions, to construe this statute, and has held, with the case which I have just read, that the statute is leveled against what are called 'puts and calls', that is, the right or the privilege which a party may have to buy or sell of you at a future day, not an absolute agreement now to sell, but where one man pays another $5 or $10 for the privilege of delivering to him 1,000, 5,000 or 10,000 bushels of grain at a future time, or pays him a similar amount for the privilege of buying or accepting from him grain at a future time—a contract which cannot be enforced in terms, because it is wholly at the option of the party holding the option whether he will call for the grain or not. This is what is termed a gambling contract, or a put or call, or an option to buy or sell at a future time, within the meaning of the Illinois Statute."

The bill of exceptions further says: "And the court further explained to the jury that the 'option to buy or sell,' prohibited by § 130, ch. 38, of the Revised Statutes, means a privilege which the buyer or seller may or may not exercise at his option, and that a contract by which the seller absolutely agrees to deliver a certain commodity to the buyer within a specified time, when the only option is as to the delivery within a certain time, such as within the whole of some month named, is not a gambling contract, within the meaning of this statute."

There were other instructions to the jury, the entire charge covering nearly seven printed pages of the record. The bill of exceptions states that the plaintiff excepted to all of the instructions given, and especially to those hereinbefore set forth.

The second case above named is a suit in equity, brought on July 24, 1883, in the Circuit Court of Cook County, Illinois, by the Bank of British North America, a corporation of Great Britain, against James B. White and George M. Barber. The bill alleges that the bank has on deposit, in its office at Chicago, Illinois, $6,700, standing to the credit of Barber, the same having been deposited by him as security for certain trades or deals in wheat with members of the Board of Trade of Chicago, the money having been turned over to the plaintiff by the Merchants' Bank of Canada, to whose business at Chicago the plaintiff succeeded; that White claims that said money belongs to him, and claims that Barber, in depositing it, acted merely as the agent of him, White; that, on April 2, 1883, White made a demand upon the plaintiff for the money, and forbade it to pay the money, or any part thereof, to any person except upon the order of him, White; that White had commenced an action against the plaintiff to recover the money; and that Barber had demanded of the plaintiff that it should pay the money to him. The bill prays that the defendants may interplead and settle the controversy, and that the plaintiff may be allowed to pay the money into court. Both of the defendants appeared in the suit. White put in an answer setting up that the $6,700 was part of a larger sum of money placed by him in the hands of Barber to be used by Barber as margins in gambling contracts which Barber was to make for him on the Board of Trade in Chicago; that Barber, in pursuance of such employment, and in April, May and June, 1882, made certain gambling contracts with members of the board of trade, which contracts were ostensibly for the sale of certain quantities of wheat by Barber to such members, to be delivered at any time in July, 1882, at the option of the pretended purchaser, but such pretended contracts were a mere form and cover, and the real intention of all the parties was to settle them by a payment of the difference between the price for which the wheat was sold and the market price of the same when delivery thereof should be called; that Barber took $6,700 of the money of White, so placed in his hands, and deposited the same with the Merchants' Bank of Canada, as security for certain of such pretended contracts, being the same $6,700 turned over to the plaintiff by the Merchants' Bank; and that, while the money was still in the possession of the plaintiff, and on April 2, 1883, White notified both the plaintiff and Barber not to pay the same to anyone but White.

Barber also answered the bill, and in his answer made the following allegations: He was not the agent of White in depositing the $6,700. As a commission merchant at Chicago, he made certain sales and purchases of grain and pork, for future delivery, at the instance and request of White, being, as between himself and those with whom he made the contracts, responsible for the performance of them on his part. A large number of such transactions occurred in May, June, July, August, September, and October, 1882. Barber was doing business on the Board of Trade of Chicago, of which he was a member, and White was living at Fort Wayne, in Indiana. The contracts were made with reference to the rules and regulations of the board of trade, and to the usages of business on that board; and, by those rules, the persons with whom Barber made such contract were authorized to demand margins and deposits, as security for the performance of the contracts by Barber, and in various instances such demands were made, and it became necessary for Barber to make deposits for margins or security with reference to the contracts. Those rules provided that, on time contracts, purchasers should have the right to require of sellers, as security, 10 per cent margins, based upon the contract price of the property bought, and further security, from time to time, to the extent of any advance in the market value above that price; also, that sellers should have the right to require as security from buyers, 10 per cent margins on the contract price of the property sold, and, in addition, any difference that might exist or occur between the estimated value of said property and the price of sale. The rules also provided that securities or margins should be deposited either with the treasurer of the board of trade, or with some bank authorized to receive the deposits. The rules also prescribed the form of certificate to be used by the bank, which form was adopted by the Merchants Bank of Canada and by the plaintiff. In accordance with those rules, the certificates showing the deposits were issued in duplicate in each case, one being marked "original" and the other "duplicate" and both being marked "not negotiable or transferable." The certificates were not made with express reference to any particular contract, and the deposits were subject to be treated as security for the fulfillment of any contracts made between the parties to the respective certificates, during the time the deposit remained unpaid. During May, 1882, Barber, at the instance and request of White, made contracts for the sale and delivery by Barber, to divers persons, members of such board of trade, of large quantities of No. 2 spring wheat, for delivery at seller's option during July, 1882, at certain prices specified in the various contracts, ranging from $1.22\frac{1}{2}$ per bushel to $1.25\frac{1}{2}$ per bushel, which wheat was to be delivered in lots of 5,000 bushels. White did not put Barber in funds to buy wheat for delivery according to the contracts. While Barber remained liable upon the contracts he was, from time to time, called upon to deposit margins on account of the contracts, to secure their performance, and did, in accordance with the rules of the board of trade, and in compliance with his duties under the contracts make deposits of money and procure certificates therefor from the Merchants Bank of Canada. The answer then gives the particulars of twelve different certificates for such deposits on various contracts, amounting in the aggregate to $6,700. The contracts for the delivery during July, 1882, of No. 2 spring wheat were not performed by White. The moneys deposited as margins were furnished by Barber in large part from his own means, for the purpose of keeping the contracts open, as was desired by White. Barber also, in order to avoid loss by White and to protect the interest of White, made, before the close of July, 1882, a tender of No. 2 red winter wheat under the contracts, which wheat was of greater intrinsic value, as Barber believed, than No. 2 spring wheat; but the tender was rejected by the purchasers, on the ground that the wheat tendered was not of the kind and grade contracted to be delivered, nor such as, under the rules of the board of trade, was necessary to be delivered. The parties with whom the contracts had been made, and who had the right to call for delivery, made large claims for damages against Barber, and insisted that the tender was irregular and insufficient; and White desired Barber to object to the payment of such claims, and to reduce the same, if he could. With this object in view, Barber, at the instance of White, filed a bill in chancery, in the Superior Court of Cook County, on September 11, 1882, against the board of trade, seeking by the bill to impeach the regularity and fairness of an award or decision of a committee which had been appointed, under the rules of the board of trade, to determine the settlement price under contracts such as those which were so made by Barber, and which committee had determined that such settlement price should be $1.35 per bushel. The bill also sought to restrain the board of trade from enforcing such award or disciplining Barber on account of noncompliance therewith. An injunction was temporarily granted on the bill. The award made Barber liable to pay, as damages, to the parties with whom he had made the contracts, the difference between the contract price and the settlement price of $1.35 per bushel. The Superior Court of Cook County adjudged, in the suit, that Barber was not entitled to any relief on account of any of the matters stated in the bill, and the injunction was dissolved on April 16, 1883. The bill was drawn up by counsel employed by White, White knowing that if the injunction should be dissolved Barber would be required to settle on the basis of the award of the committee. With reference to that basis White drew from Barber, on October 30, 1882, $987.50, as an excess of money, including profits, due to him from Barber after reserving enough to pay damages at that rate. Prior to the bringing of the suit in chancery, it was the right of the parties with whom Barber had entered into the contracts, to have the moneys which had been deposited as margins or security under the contracts paid over to them on the order of the president of the board of trade, they holding, respectively, duplicates of the certificates; and Barber, on making default as to the delivery, became amenable to discipline under the rules of the board of trade, for not complying with the terms of the contracts. One of those rules provided that, when any member of the association failed to comply promptly with the terms of any business contract or obligation, and failed to equitably and satisfactorily adjust and settle the same, he should, upon admission or proof of such delinquency before the board of directors, be by them suspended from all privileges of the association until all his outstanding obligations to members of the board of trade should be adjusted and settled. The parties who were entitled to delivery of the wheat under the contracts for delivery in July, 1882, were, by those rules, entitled to settlement with Barber at the average market price of the commodity on July 31, 1882, the day of the maturity of the contracts; and the damage or loss due to such purchasers by reason of the required settlement became thereupon immediately due and payable by Barber to such purchasers; but the payment was delayed because of difference of opinion as to the amount of damages, and in order to enable White to obtain, if possible, a reduction of them; and this was the object of the suit in chancery against the board of trade. It was also, under those rules, the right of such purchasers, after a failure for three business days succeeding the maturity of the contracts, to cause to be submitted to a select committee of three members of the board any dispute between Barber and such purchasers, with reference to any deposit of moneys applicable to the contracts; and the decision of a majority of the committee, reported to the president of the board, would have determined in what manner and to whom the deposit should be paid; and thereupon the president would have been authorized, by the rules, to make an order for the payment of the deposit in accordance with the decision of the committee, which order would have been a sufficient warrant to the bank by which the certificates were issued, to pay the money in accordance with the order; but action before the board, as against Barber, was postponed because of the injunction, and the certificates of deposit for margin and security, so issued, having reference to such wheat contracts, were held over in view of the injunction. After its dissolution, the payment of the margins or security moneys represented by the certificates was subject to be enforced under the rules of the board of trade, and Barber was in danger of being suspended from the privileges of the board because of the nonsettlement of the contracts.

White had due notice of all the foregoing facts, but failed to protect Barber or to give him any guaranty for his protection. The liability to suspension from membership of the board of trade was one of great consequence to Barber in a monetary point of view, as well as with reference to his standing and reputation as a merchant, for such suspension would have operated as practically a forfeiture of his membership, so long as the contracts remained unsettled. The fee for membership was fixed by the rules of the board at $10,000; and any permanent suspension of Barber from the membership of the board would have caused a loss to him of even more than $10,000, because it would have interfered with his livelihood and business. He could not, consistently with his rights or duties as a member of the board, defer an adjustment or settlement of the contracts any longer than was necessary to determine what he would, under the rules of the board, be required to do in respect to such settlement. In order to accommodate White as far as possible, Barber delayed making settlement until after complaint was made against him before the board in pursuance of its rules; and he allowed the complaint to proceed to a hearing, at which he attempted to make defense as to one of the contracts, setting up, among other matters, such tender of No. 2 red winter wheat; but the board ruled against him and was about to direct his suspension from membership unless he made settlement. Thereupon, on the 24th of April, 1883, he settled such of the contracts as were then outstanding, making such settlement in accordance with the rules of the board; and, on his making it, the deposits for margins and security, pertaining to the contracts, were liberated, and, on the return to the bank of the original margin certificates, so issued by the Merchants Bank of Canada, the certificates being indorsed to the bank, it gave to Barber credit for the moneys on his account as a depositor in the bank. White caused Barber to make the contracts and to become bound for their performance, and made it necessary for Barber to put up margins and security, and thus placed it out of the power of Barber to control such margins and security in any other way than according to the rules of the board of trade, and also so involved Barber, in causing him to become amenable to discipline by or suspension from the board of trade, that White could not legally or equitably revoke the authority of Barber to make settlement of the contracts or pay over the moneys when it became necessary to settle the contracts. The contracts were legal, and the provisions of the rules of the board of trade, applicable thereto, were binding upon Barber, and were necessary and proper to be considered with reference to his duties and rights, as between himself and the other contracting parties, and as between himself and White. Barber avers that it was his right to pay damages or differences on default under the contracts, when such damages became due according to the rules of the board of trade; that such right inured to him by direct authority from White, when the contracts were made at the instance of White and the moneys were paid or advanced to Barber; and that thereafter there was no time when White had any right or authority to revoke the power to pay over the moneys, when in the course of trade, or in accordance with the rules of the board of trade, it became necessary to pay them over, in making settlement of the contracts on which White defaulted, and which it became necessary for Barber to adjust, because he had become a party thereto at the instance of White; that the contracts in question were but a small part of the dealings which were had by White through Barber, as his commission merchant, with various members of the board of trade; that, in many of those dealings, which were carried on contemporaneously with the dealings in question, there was profit to White, and White received from Barber, on account thereof, large sums of money representing such profits; and that it would be inequitable for White to claim that he should be relieved at the expense of Barber from the effects of the contracts for the delivery of No. 2 spring wheat in July, 1882, which remained open at the close of that month because of the nonfulfillment thereof on the part of White, while White had received profits from other contracts of a similar character, made for him by Barber, which White chose to have settled and closed, when the same resulted in profits which were to be paid to White by Barber.

Replications were put in to these two answers and, in January, 1884, the suit was removed by Barber into the Circuit Court of the United States for the Northern District of Illinois. Afterwards, it was stipulated that the money might remain in the hands of the bank until the final disposition of the cause, subject to like order by the court as if the money were paid into the registry of the court, and an order was made dismissing the bank from the litigation, as well in the suit at law commenced against it by White, as in the interpleader suit.

By a further stipulation, made in May, 1884, the testimony taken in the suit at law before mentioned, of White against Barber, to recover the $11,412.50, at the trial which took place in February, 1884, was used and introduced by the party taking the same, as his testimony on the trial of the suit in equity. Such testimony consisted of the detailed examination of the witnesses examined on the trial of the suit at law, and of documentary testimony, the substance of which examinations and documentary testimony is given in the bill of exceptions in the suit at law, and is hereinbefore recited. To this were added, in the suit in equity, the further depositions of White and Barber, taken therein in May, 1884. In these supplementary depositions, each party goes over with greater particularity the matters previously testified to by him, as set forth in the bill of exceptions; but nothing is substantially added throwing light upon the merits of the dispute. By the same stipulation, there was put in, as part of the testimony on behalf of Barber, a copy of the proceedings and judgment in the suit at law above mentioned, brought by White against Barber, to recover the $11,412.50.

In May, 1884, a final decree was made in the suit in equity, adjudging that Barber was entitled to the $6,700, and ordering that it be paid to him. From that decree White has appealed to this court.

Mr. L. M. Ninde, for plaintiff in error and appellant:

The first and principal question is whether the charge of the court that "puts" and "calls" only were prohibited by the State, and that the contracts in question were valid and not prohibited by the statute, stated the law correctly.

Mr. Justice Blatchford delivered the opinion of the court:

The only question involved in the suit at law is as to the correctness of the charge to the jury in the particulars specially excepted to. The proper construction of the Statute of Illinois, § 130, ch. 38 of the Revised Statutes, was determined by the Supreme Court of Illinois, in Wolcott v. Heath, 78 Ill. 433, in the passage from the opinion in that case quoted by the circuit court in its charge to the jury. According to that construction, the contracts for the sale of No. 2 spring wheat, deliverable in July, 1882, made by Barber, were not void as gambling contracts, if they were bona fide contracts for the actual sale of grain, and if the only option the seller had was as to the time of delivery, the obligation assumed by Barber being to deliver the grain at all events, with the option only to deliver it at any time before the close of business on the last day of July, 1882. That the contracts made by Barber were of that character, and were not such gambling contracts as the statute denounces, must be held to have been found by the jury under the portions of the charge specially excepted to, and under other portions of the charge contained in the record. The plaintiff did not pray for any instructions to be given to the jury, nor did he present to the Court any propositions of law which he maintained the Court should lay before the jury as guides to a proper solution of the questions in controversy. The general exception to the whole of the charge cannot be regarded, as it is a violation of Rule 4 of this Court.

In its charge to the jury the circuit court explained fully to them the theory of White, that the dealings on account of which Barber paid out the moneys in question were, as between White and Barber, gambling or wager contracts and, therefore, illegal. It presented fairly to them a statement of the testimony on both sides of that question, as set forth in the bill of exceptions. It also submitted to them the question whether, in view of the testimony, the contracts in question were contracts to buy or sell at a future day, or whether they were absolute sales, in which the seller had the entire month of July, 1882, in which to perform his contracts; and it instructed them that if they should find that the dealings by the defendant for the plaintiff were options to buy or sell at a future day, their verdict should be for the plaintiff; but that if, on the contrary, they should find that such dealings were contracts by which the grain was to be absolutely delivered during the month of July, 1882, the only option being the time when, during the month, the delivery should be made, their verdict should be for the defendant. This charge was very favorable to the plaintiff, for it necessarily involved an affirmation of the propositions, that the plaintiff had a right to revoke his action in advising the tender of the No. 2 red winter wheat in fulfillment of the contracts, and had a right to revoke his express or implied assent to the appointment of the committee, under the rules of the board of trade, to determine what was a fair settling price for the wheat on the 31st of July, 1882, and had a right to recall his connection with the chancery suit brought by Barber against the board of trade, in which the validity of the contracts was recognized, and had a right to ignore the fact that he had placed Barber in the position in which, at the time of the giving of the notice of April 2, 1883, by White to Barber, Barber was not at liberty to refuse payment of the damages arising out of the nonfulfillment of the contracts, but was in danger of being expelled from the board of trade, if he persisted in such refusal.

The jury must have found, on the testimony, that the contracts made by Barber for the plaintiff at the board of trade were valid contracts, and that Barber was liable on them to either deliver the grain or pay the damages in case he failed to deliver, because the court charged the jury that if the proof satisfied them that, by the contracts, Barber was liable to either deliver the grain or pay the damages, then the contracts were not gambling contracts, and they should find for the defendant.

We find no error in the record in the suit at law, and the judgment is affirmed.

In the suit of equity, the contention on the part of White is, that the contracts and transactions between Barber and himself were wagering contracts, and, therefore, void, and that the $6,700 was subject to the demand of White, if such contracts were void. It is urged on the part of White, that the wheat was sold by Barber for him without any intention on the part of either of them that there should be any delivery thereof, but with the intention that the transactions should be settled by the payment of the differences between the prices at which the wheat was sold and its prices at the times stipulated for its delivery. White testifies that such was his understanding, communicated to Barber before Barber made the contracts of sale. Barber testifies that he has no recollection of anything of the kind. The evidence as to what White did in connection with the transactions is inconsistent with White's version, and it clearly appears that Barber had no such understanding.

The defense set up in the answer of Barber is proved to every substantial intent, and the facts therein set forth constitute a valid bar to the suit of White. The evidence shows that White in advance required that Barber should trade with parties whom he knew to be responsible; that, in each case, he gave special directions to Barber to buy or to sell, as the case might be, and left it to Barber to put the contract in form, these directions being generally given by telegrams from White at Fort Wayne to Barber at Chicago; that it was understood between them that Barber should buy or sell at the Chicago Board of Trade; that Barber, in all cases, obeyed the orders of White; that White controlled the trades which Barber made; that, unless the margin was exhausted, Barber was not to close out White's trades until White directed him to do so; that it was understood that Barber was to observe the rules of the board of trade; that White knew that Barber, as a member of such Board, making such contracts on the board for White, would be obliged to observe those rules; that White directed Barber when to cover and when to close trades, and that Barber observed his orders; that White acted on his own judgment in making the sales of wheat for delivery in July, 1882; that, when the contracts for those sales had matured, White approved of the tender being made of No. 2 red winter wheat; that, subsequently, on August 5, 1882, White telegraphed to Barber from Fort Wayne, directing him not to cancel the July trades, and saying that White's attorneys at Fort Wayne believed that such tender was good and could be enforced; and that, on the 15th of August, 1882, White, in a letter to Barber, stated that his attorney at Fort Wayne had examined the subject of the July deals, in connection with the rules of the board of trade, and had concluded that the delivery which Barber had tendered was good and was "binding on the buyer, and that we can collect the difference in court." It also appears that Barber was unwilling to default on the contracts lest it should injure his reputation on the board of trade, and that he defaulted on them because White insisted that he should do so. White knew of the rule of the board of trade under which a committee could be appointed to determine what was a fair price for property to be delivered, and was willing to leave it to such committee. After the commitee had fixed the price at $1.35 per bushel, White was advised of this action and determined that legal proceedings should be taken to set aside the award of the committee. It was in pursuance of the wish of White that the chancery suit was brought by Barber against the board of trade, to enjoin all action under such award. In that suit, an injunction was obtained to restrain such action, which injunction remained in force until the determination by the Supreme Court of Illinois of a suit brought by one Wright against the board of trade (15 Chic. Leg. N. 239), it having been stipulated that the suit of Barber against the board of trade should abide the final result of the Wright suit. The latter suit was decided in favor of the board of trade. After all this had occurred White determined to repudiate his obligations to Barber, and, on the second of April, 1883, he served on Barber the written notice, claiming that the contracts for the sale of the wheat were illegal and void, and forbidding Barber to pay over any part of the $11,412.50 to anyone but White, and demanding the immediate payment of it to him. On the 20th of April, 1883, Barber, having been notified of complaints made against him before the Board of Trade, under its rules, which provided for the hearing of complaints and for suspension or expulsion in case of noncompliance with contracts, notified White, in writing, of these facts, and asked White if he could protect him (Barber) in any way. Not receiving such protection, Barber, on the 24th of April, 1883, paid out the moneys necessary to satisfy the damages on the contracts, and thereby relieved himself from being suspended from membership in the board of trade. He had no alternative but to pay the money or lose his business, and also lose a sum of money, in the value of his membership in the board of trade, equal to if not greater than the amount in controversy in this suit. He had acted strictly according to the instructions he had received from White. White had left the money in his hands for the express purpose of paying such damages as the committee of the board of trade should find to be due. Barber retained the money in order to allow White to obtain some benefit if he could from the suit in chancery brought by Barber. By that suit and by the suit of Wright all legal means were exhausted, leaving the rights of the purchasers under the contracts of sale to be enforced according to the rules of the board of trade under which they were made. The payment of the money by Barber in satisfaction of those damages was, under the circumstances, demanded by every principle of law and equity, and no right was left in White to claim the $6,700.

White had no right to forbid the payment of the money by Barber, or to recall it from its destination. The money is to be regarded as having been, for all practical purposes, irrevocably set apart by both White and Barber for the payment of such damages, prior to the giving of the notice by White to Barber on the second of April, 1883. White had caused Barber to make the contracts and to become bound for their performance, and had made it necessary that Barber should put up the margins and security, and had thus placed it out of the power of Barber to control the margins and security in any other way than according to the rules of the board of trade, in subordination to which White as well as Barber had acted throughout. It was obedience to the orders of White which had made Barber subject to suspension or expulsion by the board of trade. The $6,700 had been put up by Barber as margins, under the rules of the board of trade, prior to the giving of the notice of April 2, 1883, and thus had been before that time devoted by White as well as Barber to the purpose of paying the damages under the rules of the board of trade.

For the reasons thus stated, we are of opinion that the claim of White, sought to be enforced in this suit in equity, cannot be allowed.

A claim is made on the part of White, that he can recover this money under the provisions of § 132, ch. 38 of the Revised Statutes of Illinois. (Hurd, Rev. Stat. ed. 1883, p. 394; ed. 1885, p. 405.) That section provides that "Any person who shall at any time * * * by any wager or bet upon any * * * unknown or contingent event whatever, lose to any person so * * * betting, any sum of money * * * amounting in the whole in the sum of $10, and shall pay * * * the same or any part thereof, the person so losing and paying * * * the same, shall be at liberty to sue for and recover the money * * * so lost and paid * * * or any part thereof, * * * by action of debt, * * * from the winner thereof, with costs, in any court of competent jurisdiction." It is a sufficient answer to this claim to say that Barber was not the "winner" of any money from White.

There is a further view applicable to this case, arising out of the decision of this court in Higgins v. McCrea, 116 U. S. 671 [29: 764]. In that case, Higgins, the broker of McCrea, sued him to recover moneys which Higgins had paid for the purchase, at the Chicago Board of Trade, of pork and lard, on the instruction of McCrea, in May, 1883, deliverable in August, 1883, on such day as the seller might elect. In his answer, McCrea set up that he had engaged with the plaintiff in gambling transactions, and that the contracts which the plaintiff had made were not contracts for the actual delivery of any merchandise, but were pretended purchases and mere options, and that it was the understanding of all the parties to the transactions that no merchandise should be delivered on the contracts, but that the same should be settled upon the differences between the contract prices and the market prices. On this basis, McCrea claimed, by way of counterclaim, to recover judgment against the plaintiff for the sum of nearly $20,000, which he alleged he had paid to the plaintiff to carry on such gambling transactions and to purchase option contracts. The plaintiff denied the version thus given by the defendant of the transactions. The circuit court had instructed the jury that the defendant was entitled to recover upon his counterclaim, and he had a judgment accordingly. This court held that the case of the defendant, as stated by himself in his answer and counterclaim, was, that the money was advanced by him to carry on a gambling transaction, that with his concurrence the money so advanced was used in such gambling transaction, and that, by the Statute of Illinois, where the contracts were made, they were treated as gambling contracts and were void; that the counterclaim thus stated was supported by the testimony of the defendant, given on the trial; that there was no Statute of Illinois to authorize the recovery of money paid on such contracts; and that no recovery could be had by the defendant. This court said, in its opinion: "We do not see on what ground a party, who says in his pleading that the money which he seeks to recover was paid out for the accomplishment of a purpose made an offense by the law, and who testifies and insists to the end of his suit that the contract on which he advanced his money was illegal, criminal, and void, can recover it back in a court whose duty it is to give effect to the law which the party admits he intended to violate."

The decree of the Circuit Court is affirmed.

EDMUND J. FORSTALL'S SONS, as Agents of BARING BROS. & CO. ET AL.

Sale by pledgee—equity action for value of bonds.

1. Where a pledgeor of bonds indorsed them to the bearer and delivered them to the pledgee, to be by him sold and disposed of at his free will and pleasure, without notice or accountability to the pledgeor, held that this was a consent to a sale of the bonds by the pledgee and a waiver by the pledgeor of any right accruing under a former sale of the bonds—the second sale having been to bona fide purchasers for value and fairly made.

2. The pledgeor could not, after waiting some time after the sale, when the bonds had risen to par, maintain an action in equity to recover the value of the bonds, where he had never made any tender for the purpose of redeeming them nor any effort to reclaim them.

The case is fully stated in the opinion.

Mr. Justice Miller delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an appeal from the decree of the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Louisiana dismissing the bill of the complainants, who are appellants here.

The appellants are commissioners of the Mechanics and Traders Bank, a corporation organized under the laws of the State of Louisiana, which being in liquidation they were appointed as such by one of the state courts of New Orleans. Before the failure of the bank, which was declared to be insolvent on the 19th day of March, 1879, there had been placed by it in the hands of Edmund J. Forstall's Sons, as agents of Baring Bros. & Co., a very considerable amount of public securities, bonds of the City of New Orleans, and coupons, under an agreement that they should hold them as security for the indebtedness of the bank to Baring Bros. & Co., an English banking house. It is said that these securities, at the time the bill was filed, were of the value of $336,400.

It is alleged in the bill that shortly after the bank was declared to be insolvent: to wit, on or about the 22d day of May, 1879, the said E. J. Forstall's Sons fraudulently pretended to sell said bonds and thereby attempted to deprive the complainants of a large portion of the assets of the bank, which was a great wrong and detriment to the creditors and depositors. The fraud alleged in regard to this pretended sale was, that, offering the bonds without any advertisement, at a private sale, and without notice to complainants, the defendants employed one firm of brokers to sell the securities and instructed another to buy them in on account of said Forstall's Sons, as agents of Baring Bros. & Co., and that they were not sold according to the well known usage in the City of New Orleans in such cases, nor according to the terms of the contract of pledge. They insist that this sale was made contrary to law and equity, and is therefore void as against the bank and its creditors; they protested against said sale; and that thereafter, to wit, about the third of March, 1880, their right to sue for said bonds and any damages arising from said illegal sale was expressly reserved in an agreement and settlement with said Forestall's Sons, as such agents, as well as by judgment rendered by the Fifth District Court, in a suit entitled State ex rel. Wogan v. Mechanics & Traders Bank [35 La. Ann. 562]. They further say that the bonds, which were sold for a very small amount, less than 50 per cent of their face value, are now worth in the market fully such face value, if not more.

The bill requires an answer from the defendants under oath, and appends six specific interrogatories to be answered. The relief prayed is that the pretended sale of the bonds may be decreed to be null and void, and the complainants to be their owners, and that the defendants, Edmund J. Forstall's Sons, be ordered to return them to complainants; and that in default thereof they be decreed to pay their full value of $336,400, subject to the claim of Baring Bros. & Co. against the bank of about $120,000; and for such other and further relief as the nature of the case may require.

The answer to this bill sets out a copy of the agreement under which Forstall's Sons held the securities as follows:

"NEW ORLEANS, 11th March, 1876.

"Whereas, Messrs. Baring Bros. & Co., of London, have continued in favor of the Mechanics and Traders Bank of New Orleans a credit of forty thousand pounds sterling, in accordance with the terms of the letter of Messrs. Baring Bros. & Co., dated 24th May, 1878, and addressed to the said bank, and confirmed by their cable, of Oct. 27th, 1878, to Edm. J. Forstall & Sons: Now, in order to secure the full and punctual payment of such amount as may be or become due on account of said credit, the Mechanics and Traders Bank does hereby pledge to Messrs. Baring Bros. & Co., and place in the hands of Edm. J. Forstall's Sons, as their representatives, the property described on the list annexed to the present.

"And it is hereby agreed that in the event of the nonpayment of the amount due as above stated, Edm. J. Forstall's Sons are hereby authorized, as agents of Messrs. Baring Bros. & Co. and of the bank, to cause said pledged property to be disposed of for cash, at public or private sale, at the option of said Edm. J. Forstall's Sons, and the proceeds of said sale shall be applied to the payment of the amount due as aforesaid, with interest accrued thereon, and all commissions, costs, and charges attending said sale, the obligation of the bank for any balance that may be left uncovered by the proceeds of said sale remaining in full force.

"H. GALLY, President,
"MOSES HARRIS, Cashier,
"EDM. J. FORSTALL'S SONS, Agents."

The defendants deny any fraud in the sale of the securities, but admit that, finding it necessary on the failure of the bank to sell the bonds held under the foregoing agreement, they put them into the hands of a broker to be sold on the market in the usual way, and instructed another broker to see that they were not sacrificed, authorizing him to say that they would pay one eighth of one per cent more for them to the purchaser than they would sell for. They claim that in this way the securities were returned to them, and that this was done without any fraudulent purpose, but to secure the highest market price for the bonds at the sale. They further deny that they ever made any agreement by which they recognized the right of complainants in the bonds after this sale. They admit that in one or two settlements made in the fifth district court, in the course of the liquidation of the bank, certain reservations were made in regard to the rights of the commissioners to assert further claims on those bonds by litigation; but that they never admitted the existence of any right of recovery against these defendants. They say, however, that whatever right complainants may have had to call these defendants to account for any value in the bonds beyond that for which they were sold, was abandoned and expressly given up by the act of the complainants in indorsing the bonds under an order, obtained on the application of said commissioners, from the said Fifth District Court of the Parish of Orleans, under whose jurisdiction the bank was being liquidated; and that therafter, on or about the 20th day of May, 1880, the complainants did indorse all said bonds to bearer under the certification and seal of office of A. Abat, a notary public, for the purpose of giving authenticity to such action. And complainants did then deliver said bonds so indorsed by them to Forstall's Sons, to be by them sold and disposed of at their free will and pleasure, without any further notice to complainants or accountability or responsibility of Baring Bros. & Co.

They further say that the said bonds were duly and regularly sold and disposed of to strangers by said Edmund J. Forstall's Sons, in good faith and in accordance with the usual and customary course of such business in New Orleans, at the dates and for the prices stated in Exhibit No. 3, annexed thereto, and that such prices were the full and fair values of said bonds at the time of sale, and the utmost and best prices that could be had or obtained for the same. Accompanying this is a schedule of the sales, with the dates, and the prices which the bonds brought. This amount was considerably less than the debt due by the bank to Baring Bros. & Co.

There is very little contradiction in regard to the facts of the case, as shown by the testimony and the pleadings. As to the question of intentional fraud in the first sale of the bonds, it is repelled by the testimony of the members of the firm of Forstall's Sons, and yet the transaction is one which it might be difficult to sustain in a court of equity. We do not feel, however, called upon, in view of other facts in the case, to decide this question. Nor do we think it necessary to pass upon the effect of what is called in the bill of complaint the right reserved to the complainants to sue the defendants on account of that transaction.

In the course of the administration of the affairs of the bank in the Fifth District Court of Orleans, it became necessary to declare dividends; and Baring Bros. & Co. asserted a claim to a share of such dividends, on acccount of the difference between the amount of their debt and the amount for which the securities had been sold. This difference was about forty-nine thousand dollars. In submitting to the payment of these dividends the defendants and the complainants agreed to a judgment by the Fifth District Court, which contained the following clause:

"It is further ordered, adjudged, and decreed that all the rights of both the opponents and the bank in liquidation touching the value of 180 missing coupons, and any damages resulting from the sale of the bonds of the bank in pledge by said opponents, are expressly reserved."

It is asserted by defendants that by subsequent settlements and proceedings in that court this reservation was abandoned, and that a judgment of the court on that subject is a bar to the present suit. For a reason, presently to be seen, we do not think it necessary to decide this question either. Whatever the reservation of a right to sue may mean, it cannot be construed into an admission of a liability of the defendants, or that a just cause of action existed; and it may be conceded that up to the time of the indorsement of these bonds to bearer, on the 20th of May, 1880, of which there is no denial, they were still in the possession of Forstall's Sons, under such circumstances that if the amount of the debt to Baring Bros. & Co. had been tendered to them, and a demand made of the bonds, the plaintiffs would have been entitled to have them delivered up. No such tender was made. No such demand was made. The bonds at that time were but little, if any, more valuable than they were at the time of the first sale by Forstall's Sons.

We are of opinion that the action of the present complainants, in indorsing these bonds as payable to bearer, and delivering them in that condition to Forstall's Sons, with the knowledge that they had been or were to be sold again by that firm, and for the purpose of enabling them to transfer them with a good title, must be considered a waiver of any right to sue on account of the first sale. This indorsement, and the subsequent sale by Forstall's Sons, were in fact a waiver on both sides of the previous sale, and of any rights accruing under it, as well as a consent by both parties to the second sale.

The sales appear to have been made at different times and to different persons, each of whom became therefore innocent purchasers for value of the bonds which are the subject of controversy. No attempt is made to impeach the fairness of these sales. It is not even charged that the prices obtained were less than the market value of the bonds sold. If the right to sell these bonds for the debt due to Baring Bros. & Co. at that time be conceded, as we think it must be, then no just complaint can be made of the sales or of the proceedings attending them. A full report of those sales, with the amounts received, and a statement of the account as thus adjusted, is set out by the answer as an exhibit.

If the complainants had chosen to stand upon their rights, or the rights of the bank, growing out of the fraud in the first sale, it may be well to consider what course they should have pursued. Treating the first sale as a fraud they might have tendered the amount due on the bonds and brought an action of replevin or sequestration. But there were two reasons why they could not do this. First, they did not have the money to tender to Forstall's Sons for the debt to Baring Bros. & Co.; and second, the bonds were not worth any more in the market than they had been sold for by Forstall's Sons, and the amount credited on the debt to Baring Bros. & Co. They might also have brought an action in the nature of tort for conversion, in which case, if they had succeeded, the value of the bonds would have been the measure of their recovery, after deducting the amount due to Baring Bros. & Co.

It is obvious, as the testimony clearly shows, that the bonds were worth but little more in a fair market at the time this indorsement was made than when they were first sold by Forstall's Sons, and that there was no right of action at law by which any sum could have been recovered worth the litigation. It is, therefore, easy to conceive that when these commissoners of the bank in liquidation asked of the court, in which that liquidation was pending, for power to indorse these bonds and deliver them to Forstall's Sons for sale, they were doing the wisest thing that could be done at that time for the creditors of the bank; for by such sale the bank would get the benefit of all that the pledged securities were worth then in the market, and by any action at law which they could bring they could recover no more.

The complainants in this case seek to avoid all considerations of this kind by bringing a bill in equity. And, ignoring all the transactions that have taken place about the disposition of the bonds, they ask that the defendants shall be decreed to deliver up these bonds to them, and, if they fail to comply with that order, that they shall be held liable for the present market value, which has increased during the continuance of this controversy, and since their last sale by Forstall's Sons, to the sum of $336,400, being the par value of the various bonds and coupons.

It is clear that complainants, when they brought this action, knew very well that they could not have the relief asked for in the first part of their claim, because by their own indorsement of the bonds they had been transferred under valid sales to numerous persons, who either held them as innocent purchasers for value or had parted with them to others who held them in the same character. Their only efficient prayer of relief, therefore, was for a decree against the defendants for the value of the bonds, which they now insist must be estimated as of the time of the decree.

The first objection to this relief is that it is simply what they could recover, if they could recover at all, in an action at law. It is the damages which, on their theory, are due for an unlawful conversion of the bonds. It is so spoken of by counsel in the argument, and the authorities referred to as furnishing the measure of damages are all in cases of actions at law for what is equivalent to a conversion of property held for another's use. We see no reason why a court of equity should be resorted to for this remedy; nor is there anything in the nature of the transaction, since no actual fraud on the part of Forstall's Sons is proved, why an action at law should not have been the appropriate one to recover these damages. The case is by no means a complex or difficult one. The facts are few and easily proved. The transactions are open and patent to everybody, and an action at law would afford complete and ample remedy for the wrong complained of.

But if we suppose that the nature of the case is one of which a court of equity has jurisdiction, as equity is administered in the circuit courts of the United States, then other considerations seem to forbid the relief prayed for, or any equitable relief whatever.

The first of these considerations is that the complainants, as representing the bank and its creditors, have not only never made any tender for the purpose of redeeming these bonds, but have received their full market value as a credit on the debt to Baring Bros. & Co., to the payment of which they were devoted, as well as permitted the transaction by which these bonds were sold, and the proceeds so appropriated, to stand from May, 1880, when the sale was made, until May, 1882, when the present suit was brought, without any further effort to reclaim the bonds, and without any further protest against that sale, and without payment of any dividend on the sum for which they sold. It is obvious that during the greater part of this time the value of these bonds was rising in the market, and the persons who had purchased them at open sale for a fair consideration were receiving the benefit of this increase in price; but they were not responsible in any way to the complainants, who had indorsed those bonds and thus enabled them to purchase them.

The proposition now made by complainants, that, after waiting during all this time, and seeing the bonds rise in value, they could elect to bring suit in equity when their price had risen to par, and they were worth, with the accumulated interest and coupons, nearly three times what they were sold and accounted for, is one which does not commend itself to a court of equity. It may be true that it was the misfortune of the bank that it had no money during this time to tender for the redemption of these bonds; but it is equally true that if they had made such tender, they well knew that they could not get them, because they had passed from the possession of the present defendants.

Nothing hindered them from bringing their action at law at any time. To say that they could delay for any length of time, within the period of prescription, and bring this suit in equity when the securities bore the highest price in the market, would be very unjust, even if they had given no consent and taken no part in the sale of the bonds. But when we consider, in addition, that the sale could not have been made without their consent, that they themselves procured an order of the court authorizing them to consent, and actually placed upon them the indorsement without which they could not have been sold at all, it is idle to say that they were not bound by that sale, and that they now retain a right to go upon the trustees of this pledge to recover of them the increase in the value of the securities between that time and the present.

This attempt to play fast and loose with a supposed right of action, against parties who were mere agents or trustees, and who had no interest in the cause, while through a series of years the value of the matter in contest went up and down in the scale of public market prices, does not commend itself to the conscience of anyone. The truth is, that, conceding the first sale to have been simply void and ineffective, the bonds remaining in the hands of Forstall's Sons, it became their duty to sell those bonds at as early a time as possible, and place the proceeds in the hands of Baring Bros. & Co., in payment of the obligation of the bank to them. That this has been done faithfully, and with the consent and aid of the complainants, is a sufficient answer to all that is alleged in the bill.

The decree of the Circuit Court dismissing the bill is therefore affirmed.

v.

GEORGE R. MADISON.

Ground of error—abstract questions of law.

1. Where the court, in submitting a case to the jury, directed them to disregard certain testimony as improperly admitted, and the jury could not have been misled, held, that the admission of the testimony was no ground of error.

2. Abstract questions of law will not be considered here on a writ of error, unless it appears from the bill of exceptions, or otherwise in the record, that the facts were such as to make such questions material to the issue which was tried.

Argued Nov. 11, 1887. Decided Dec. 5, 1887.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Northern District of Ohio. Affirmed.

The action was brought by a brakeman to recover damages for personal injuries received while attending to the duties required of him as brakeman, and which he claims to have resulted from the negligence of the Railroad Company.

As appeared from the evidence, Madison, the plaintiff, entered between two cars of a freight train with intent to perform the duties of a brakeman, but caught his foot between the rail of the track and the plank which was there spiked down between the tracks for a roadway crossing, and before he could extricate his foot, the car wheel came upon him and caused the injury.

The case is further stated by the court.

Messrs. J. E. Ingersoll and L. A. Russell, for plaintiff in error:

Additional precautions and safeguards taken by the company after an injury are not admissible to show its negligence.

Pierce, R. R. 294; Baird v. Daly, 68 N. Y. 547; Holbert v. St. Louis, K. C. & N. R. Co. 45 Iowa, 27; Morse v. Minneapolis & St. L. R. Co. 11 Am. & Eng. R. R. Cas. 170.

The declarations and admissions of the company's servants are admissible only when a part of the res gestæ.

Pierce, R. R. 294.

Plaintiff assumed the risk arising from the negligence of the road master or section boss as that of a colaborer or fellow servant.

Co.* v. Ross, 112 U. S. 377 (28: 787).

In Northern Pac. R. R. Co. v. Herbert, 116 U. S. 642 (29: 755), the court by divided opinion holds, p. 652 (760) that a superintendent of repairs was, so far as that duty was concerned, the representative of the Company and his negligence was its negligence.

But see Mad River & L. E. R. R. Co. v. Barber, 5 Ohio. St. 541; Columbus & X. R. R. Co. v. Webb, 12 Ohio St. 475; Little Miami R. R. Co. v. Fitzpatrick, 42 Ohio St. 318; Whaalan v. Mad River & L. E. R. R. Co. 8 Ohio St. 251.

Mr. Edward S. Meyer, for defendant in error:

There is no bill of exceptions, of which this court can take cognizance.

R. S. U. S. § 914; R. S. of Ohio, §§ 5298, 5301, 5302; Kerr v. State, 36 Ohio St. 614; Hill v. Bassett, 27 Ohio St. 597; Muller v. Ehlers, 91 U. S. 249 (23: 319); Hunnicutt v. Peyton, 102 U. S. 333 (26: 113).

The evidence claimed to be incompetent was relevant as part of the res gestæ, even though it disclosed the immediate repair of the defective roadbed by the roadmaster and section foreman.

Cooper v. Coates, 88 U. S. 21 Wall. 105 (22: 481).

The duty of a railroad company to provide and maintain in proper repair a suitable and reasonably safe roadbed, tracks, and necessary appliances, is one that cannot be delegated to any of its servants so as to relieve the company of responsibility to a servant who is injured.

In the performance of such delegated duty the servant represents the company, and his negligence is the negligence of the company.

Even if the injury to the servant is caused in part by the negligence of a fellow servant, and in part by the failure of the defendant company to provide or maintain a suitable roadbed, track, or necessary appliances, the negligence of the fellow servant will not exonerate the company from the consequences of its own default.

Messrs. J. E. Ingersoll and L. A. Russell, for plaintiff in error, in reply:

Our bill of exceptions is sufficient.

U. S. v. Breitling, 61 U. S. 20 How. 252 (15: 900); Dredge v. Forsyth, 67 U. S. 2 Black, 563 (17: 253); Phelps v. Mayer, 56 U. S. 15 How. 160 (14: 648); Stanton v. Embrey, 93 U. It must appear beyond a doubt that admission of improper evidence neither did prejudice nor could have prejudiced a party against whom the error was made, or the case will be reversed.

What was done by the Railway Company by way of changing the position of the plank at the place of the accident, on the afternoon of the day and some time after the accident, and what was said by the employee then making the repairs, as to the condition of the plank at the time of the accident, were not admissible as parts of the res gestæ.

This suit was brought by Madison, the defendant in error, for injuries received by him through the alleged negligence of the New York, Lake Erie and Western Railroad Company, while he was in its employ as a brakeman. He charged in his petition that "After a train of cars operated by said defendant, and on which train he was employed as aforesaid, had stopped at the Town of Mantua, a station along the line of said Company in the district and division aforesaid, it became necessary in the course of his duties to step between two cars of said train for the purpose of uncoupling them, and while so engaged, without any fault or negligence on his part, but through the fault and negligence of this defendant in permitting its roadbed at said town to remain in an unsafe, insecure, and dangerous condition, all of which was unknown to this plaintiff, his right foot was caught and held fast in said roadbed, and while so caught and held, being unable to extricate it, he was, without any fault on his part, but through the negligence and carelessness of defendant, struck, jammed, and run over by one of defendant's cars, so injuring his left leg as to necessitate its amputation and cause the loss thereof."

The answer denied that the injury was caused by the negligence of the Company, and insisted that it happened through the fault of the plaintiff himself.

The errors assigned here are:

1. That the circuit court erred in the admission of incompetent evidence at the trial; and,

2. That the circuit court erred in its charge to the jury.

In reference to the first of these assignments the bill of exceptions shows that at the trial several witnesses were called by the plaintiff, who were permitted to testify to certain alterations which were made in the roadbed by the section foreman, with the knowledge and approval of the road master, after the accident occurred. This was objected to at the time, and exceptions were duly taken; but the court, in submitting the case to the jury, directed them to disregard that testimony altogether, as it had been improperly admitted, and must not be considered as tending to prove that the "railroad track was not in a reasonably safe condition at the time." It is true that, in one place in its charge, the court said this evidence was "not to be regarded * * * as an admission of the defendant of the defective character of the roadbed;" but afterwards it was expressly stated that the testimony was not to be considered at all, as the section foreman could not at the time the alternations were made do anything that would bind the Company upon the question of the condition of the track when the accident occurred. The jury could not have been misled on this subject.

As to the other error assigned, it is sufficient to say that there is nothing in the record to show the materiality of the charge complained of, or of the requests to charge which were refused. No part of the evidence, save that which was excepted to, is set out in the bill of exceptions, and there is no such statement of the facts proven as will enable us to see that the charge as given or refused had any reference to the case as it appeared at the trial. The record as it comes to us presents only abstract questions of law, which may or may not have been ruled in a way to affect the defendant injuriously. It has long been settled that such questions will not be considered here on a writ of error unless it appears from the bill of exceptions, or otherwise in the record, that the facts were such as to make them material to the issue which was tried. As was said in Dunlop v. Munroe, 11 U. S. 7 Cranch, 270 [3:339]: "Each bill of exceptions must be considered as presenting a distinct and substantive case; and it is on the evidence stated in itself alone that the court is to decide. We cannot go beyond it and collect other facts which must have been in the mind of the party, and the insertion of which in this bill of exceptions could alone have sanctioned the opinion as prayed for." To the same effect is Worthington v. Mason, 101 U. S. 149, 152 [25:848, 849], where this appears: "As we understand the principles on which judgments here are reviewed by writ of error, that error must appear by some ruling on the pleadings, or on a state of facts presented to this court. Those facts, apart from the pleadings, can only be shown here by a special verdict, an agreed statement duly signed and submitted to the court below, or by bill of exceptions. When, in the latter, complaint is made of the instructions given or refused, it must be accompanied by a distinct statement of testimony given or offered which raises the question to which the instructions apply." "The proof of the facts which make the charge erroneous must be distinctly set forth, or it must appear that evidence was given tending to prove them." See also U. S. v. Morgan, 52 U. S. 11 How. 154, 158 [13:643, 645]: Reed v. Gardner, 84 U. S. 17 Wall. 409 [21:665]; Jones v. Buckell, 104 U. S. 554 [26:-841]; Phœnix L. Ins. Co. v. Raddin, 120 U. S. 183, 196 [30: 644, 648].

Upon the record as it comes to us we find no error, and the judgment is consequently affirmed.

Assignment of errors—printed brief.

1. Where section 997, R. S., and Rules 8 and 21 of this court, have been disregarded, and there is no assignment of errors in the transcript, nor any specification of errors, nor statement presenting the questions involved, nor the manner in which they are raised, in the brief, nor reference to the pages of the record relied on to support the points, the cases will be dismissed, under § 5 of Rule 21, for want of an assignment of errors, and of a brief such as is required by the rules.

2. The assignment of errors, on the appeal from the district court to the Supreme Court of the Territory, cannot be accepted in this court as the equivalent of the assignment required by the statute.

Kerr v. Clampitt, 95 U. S. 188 (24:498); Head v. Hargrave, 105 U. S. 45 (26:1028).

Section 997 of the Revised Statutes is in these words:

"There shall be annexed to and returned with any writ of error for the removal of a cause, at the day and place therein mentioned, an authenticated transcript of the record, an assignment of errors, and a prayer for reversal, with a citation to the adverse party."

Rule 8, § 1, of this court is as follows:

"The clerk of the court to which any writ of error may be directed shall make return of the same, by transmitting a true copy of the record, and of the assignment of errors, under his hand and the seal of the court."

Rule 21 requires printed briefs to be filed, and § 2 of that rule provides that the brief shall contain, " in the order here stated:

"(1.) A concise abstract, or statement of the case, presenting succinctly the questions involved and the manner in which they were raised.

"(2.) A specification of the errors relied upon, which, in cases brought up by writ of error, shall set out separately and particularly each error asserted and intended to be urged; and in cases brought up by appeal the specification shall state, as particularly as may be, in what the decree is alleged to be erroneous. When the error alleged is to the admission or to the rejection of evidence, the specification shall quote the full substance of the evidence admitted or rejected. When the error alleged is to the charge of the court, the specification shall set out the part referred to totidem verbis, whether it be instructions given or instructions refused. When the error alleged is to a ruling upon the report of a master, the specification shall state the exception to the report and the action of the court upon it.

"(3.) A brief of the argument, exhibiting a clear statement of the points of law or fact to be discussed, with a reference to the pages of the record and the authorities relied upon in support of each point. When a statute of a State is cited, so much thereof as may be deemed necessary to the decision of the case shall be printed at length."

Sections 4 and 5 of the same rule are as follows:

"4. When there is no assignment of errors, as required by section 997 of the Revised Statutes, counsel will not be heard, except at the request of the court; and errors not specified according to this rule will be disregarded; but the court, at its option, may notice a plain error not assigned or specified.

"5. When, according to this rule, a plaintiff in error or an appellant is in default, the case may be dismissed on motion; and when a defendant in error or an appellee is in default, he will not be heard, except on consent of his adversary, and by request of the court."

This statute and these rules have been disregarded altogether in this case. No assignment of errors is found in the transcript annexed to and returned with the writ. The assignment of errors on the appeal from the District Court to the Supreme Court of the Territory cannot be accepted in this court as the equivalent of the assignment required by the statute.

The brief contains no specification of errors such as is required by the rule, and there is no statement of the case presenting the questions involved, or the manner in which they are raised. In the argument there is no reference to the pages of the record relied on to support the points which are made. Not only is there a failure to quote the full substance of the evidence admitted or rejected, of which complaint is made, but even the names of the several witnesses upon whose testimony the objections rest are not mentioned. In short, to get at the matter which is complained of, we must hunt through what is called a "proposed statement on appeal and motion for a new trial," filling thirty pages of the record, with nothing in the brief to aid us in the search. This we are unwilling to do. In the present crowded state of our docket, we must insist on a reasonable compliance with the rules which have been adopted to facilitate the investigation of cases and help us in our work.

We therefore dismiss the case, under § 5 of Rule 21, for want of an assignment of errors and of a brief such as is required by the rules. Dismissed.

Federal question—banking law.

1. A claim against a purchaser of shares of the capital stock of a national bank, for his failure to insert his own name or that of some other responsible person in the blank transfer, signed on the books of the bank, presents no federal question.
2. The purchaser's obligation, if any, grows out of his contract and not out of the banking law. There is nothing in that law which makes it his duty to save his assignors from harm by reason of their former ownership, or which requires him to register his ownership for their protection.

The facts are stated by the court.

Messrs. Enoch Totten and Henry C. Miller, for plaintiffs in error:

As between vendor and vendee the transaction was completed, and Kennedy was the owner of the stock.

Ang. & Ames, Corp., § 354, Field, Corp. § 354; Thomp. Bank Cas. 343; Johnston v. Laflin, 103 U. S. 804 (26:534).

The vendors remain liable for assessments on the stock, if the purchaser fails to have the stock transferred to him or to some one capable of becoming owner. Transfers to irresponsible parties are disregarded.

Thomp. Liabilities of Shareholders, § 217; Germania Nat. Bank v. Case, 99 U. S. 628 (25:448); Pullman v. Upton, 96 U. S. 330 (24:819); Bowden v. Johnson, 107 U. S. 260 (27:389); Price v. Whitney, 28 Fed. Rep. 297; Anderson v. Philadelphia Warehouse Co. 111 U. S. 488 (28:480).

If the purchaser fails in this duty and keeps his stock standing after the sale in the names of his vendors, so as to subject them to liability for assessments, the purchaser is undoubtedly bound to his vendors for the assessments they have been made to pay.

Thomp. Liabilities of Shareholders, § 217; Walker v. Bartlett, 86 Eng. C. Messrs. W. Hallett Phillips and James Mc Connell, for defendant in error:

Chicago & A. R. R. Co. v. Wiggins Ferry Co. 119 U. S. 624 (30:523); Williams v. Weaver, 100 U. S. 547 (25:708).

Should the court decide to entertain jurisdiction, the decision of the state supreme court was manifestly correct.

At the hearing of this cause a motion was made to dismiss the writ of error for want of jurisdiction, on the ground that no federal question was involved in the decision below. This motion will be first considered. The facts as disclosed by the record are as follows:

On the 24th of February, 1873, Le Sassier & Binder sold to Samuel H. Kennedy at New Orleans, through his broker, E. C. Feinour, forty shares of the capital stock of the Crescent City National Bank, and in accordance with the prevailing custom at that place upon such sales, signed a transfer of the shares sold upon the transfer book of the bank, leaving the name of the transferee blank. On the 15th of March Kennedy sold the same stock to Thomas A. Adams, a responsible person; but at the request of the purchaser the transfer on the books of the bank was made to Morris Dyer, who was irresponsible, by writing his name in the blank left for the name of the transferee in the assignment which had been signed by Le Sassier & Binder. The bank was known to be embarrassed March 14, and on the 17th of that month it closed its doors, and soon afterwards a receiver was appointed, under the National Banking Act, by the Comptroller of the Currency. On the first of August, 1874, the receiver, by direction of the Comptroller, brought a suit against the shareholders, to enforce their individual liability for the debts of the bank, under § 5151 of the Revised Statutes. To this suit Kennedy was made a party as the holder of the shares which had been sold to him as above. He appeared and filed an answer, setting up his sale to Adams as a defense. Upon the hearing a final decree was rendered June 2, 1876, dismissing the bill as to him. A suit was then brought by the receiver against Le Sassier & Binder, alleging that they were the owners of the stock at the time of the failure of the bank. They notified Kennedy that this suit had been begun, and that if their defense failed they should fall back on him, and hold him for whatever amount they might be compelled to pay "on stock which, from February 24, 1873, they had ceased to own, and had transferred to him." In the answer of Le Sassier & Binder they set up the sale to Kennedy as a defense to the action. At the final hearing a judgment was rendered against them on the pleadings and proofs, May 16, 1879, for $2,800, and interest at five per cent per annum from July 23, 1874. This judgment they paid, and then brought the present suit against Kennedy to recover from him the amount of their payment.

In the petition it was alleged that, upon the sale of the stock to Kennedy and the signing of the transfer on the books of the bank, it became his duty to insert his name in the blank left for that purpose, and that they had been compelled to pay the judgment in favor of the receiver "owing to the conduct of the said Kennedy in not causing his name to be inserted in the transfer book aforesaid as transferee of said stock, and preserving in said transfer book of said bank, contrary to his obligation and duty, the said transfer in blank, with your petitioners' name signed thereto, from the time of said sale to him until said * * * bank failed, and owing to the other acts of the said * * * Kennedy in the premises, by which he subjected your petitioners to a liability which was his own, and which he should have met; that his said conduct and acts were violative of his obligations in the premises and your petitioners' rights; were unlawful, illegal, and have caused to your petitioners loss and damage to the extent of * * * said amount paid by them."

From this statement of the case it is apparent that the suit was not brought against Kennedy to enforce any liability of his under the National Banking Act. That liability was disposed of in the suit of the receiver against him for its enforcement. Neither do Le Sassier & Binder claim under the receiver, nor are they seeking to enforce the liability of Kennedy as a shareholder. Their claim, and their only claim, against him is for his failure to insert his own name, or that of some other responsible person, in the blank which had been left by them in the transfer they signed on the books of the bank for the stock he had bought. His obligation to them, if any there is, grows out of his contract with them as a purchaser, and not out of the banking law. That presents no federal question. There is nothing in that law which makes it his duty to save his assignors from harm by reason of their former ownership, or which required him to register his ownership for their protection.

Neither is it at all important that, in its opinion, the Supreme Court of the State expressed a doubt as to the correctness of the judgment against Le Sassier & Binder. That judgment, as it stood, was conclusive on that point, and if Kennedy had been liable to them at all, it would have been for the amount adjudged, because he had been called upon to defend if he desired to do so. He was discharged, not because the judgment was wrong, but because he had not, in the opinion of the court, been guilty of any neglect of duty towards those against whom it was rendered, which would make him liable to them therefor.

The motion to dismiss is granted.

Mr. Justice Miller delivered the opinion of the court:

These are separate actions brought by the same plaintiffs against the same defendant in the Circuit Court of the United States for the Western District of Missouri.

The first was an action of replevin, under which plaintiffs got possession of 1,232 head of cattle; and the second was an action to recover damages for a failure on the part of defendant to fulfill a contract of agistment with regard to the same cattle. As the rights of the parties depended upon the same contract, and as the testimony in each case was pertinent in the other, the court very properly ordered their consolidation and trial together before the same jury. The testimony submitted to the jury on both sides of the controversy is embodied in a single bill of exceptions under the introductory phrase that each party offered testimony tending to prove such and such facts. This bill of exceptions is very voluminous, consisting of a great variety of evidence running through twenty-eight pages of printed matter; and to none of it does there appear to have been any objection offered by either party. The questions presented in the record are exclusively upon the charge of the judge to the jury, on exceptions taken by the plaintiffs below, who are also plaintiffs here, and to the refusal of the court to grant such instructions as the plaintiffs' counsel prayed for.

A verdict was rendered for the defendant, holding that he was entitled to the return of the property replevied from him, or to the sum of $23,885.12, which was found by the jury to be the value of his interest in the property. In regard to the other suit the verdict of the jury was simply for the defendant. Judgments were rendered in accordance with these verdicts to which the present writs of error are prosecuted.

It seems from the evidence that the plaintiffs, under the partnership style of J. Teal & Company, were owners of about 3,000 head of cattle, which they had driven across the plains from Oregon to a shipping point on the Union Pacific Railroad, called Rock Creek Station, in Wyoming Territory. These cattle were shipped from this point to Council Bluffs, in the State of Iowa, between the 14th day of October and the 10th day of November, 1880. On the third day of November of that year Teal & Company entered into a written contract with John S. Bilby, of Nodaway County, Missouri, by which Bilby agreed to keep, feed and care for 1,500 of these cattle until December 1, 1881. By this instrument he agreed that he would so feed and care for them that they would increase in weight 450 pounds each, on an average, for which the plaintiffs were to pay him, on their delivery to them, at the rate of five cents per pound for such increase.

It also appears that before the terms of this agreement were decided upon one lot of about 200 cattle had arrived at Council Bluffs, and had been seen by Bilby. It was a part of the agreement that the remainder, as they arrived, should be average lots with those that Bilby had seen, of which fact Mr. Bass, of the firm of Rosenbaum, Bass & Co., who resided at Council Bluffs, was to be the judge. The expense of transporting the cattle to Dawsonville, Missouri, where Mr. Bilby resided, was to be paid by plaintiffs; but if Mr. Bilby should pay any of that expense, he was to be repaid with ten per cent interest upon his money on final settlement.

There is also evidence to show that Mr. Bilby was a man of means, owning extensive lands in the neighborhood of Dawsonville, and accustomed to the business of feeding cattle; and the agreement was that the cattle should be weighed at Dawsonville, or the nearest scales thereto, upon their arrival, under circumstances minutely provided for, and that Bilby contracted "to take the cattle and winter them well on hay, straw, and stalk fields until grass comes; to be kept in enclosed pastures on good grass until the 15th of August, 1881, after which date, on each and every day they shall be fed all the corn they will eat until delivered to J. Teal & Company;" and that the cattle were to be redelivered to the plaintiffs between the 15th day of October and the first day of December, 1881, by giving ten days' notice. Bilby was also to be responsible for all cattle lost, strayed, or stolen, and for any dying through his neglect or carelessness; but if any died through causes which were unavoidable, the loss of such cattle was to be borne by Teal & Company, and the loss of the feed by Bilby.

Another provision to which some importance is attached is in the following language: "If any steers die, John S. Bilby shall preserve the hides as evidence of death, and the ears if there are any ear marks."

It is agreed that 268 of these cattle were not recovered by plaintiffs under the writ of replevin; nor were they tendered by Bilby under the tender which he sets up in his answer; nor did the weight of the cattle at the time Bilby was ready to deliver them, or offered to deliver them, or at the time they were replevied, come up to that which was required to make the increase of 450 pounds each on an average. It is on the ground of this failure to bring the cattle up to the contract weight, alleging that it was the fault of Bilby in not giving sufficient care and attention to them, as well as want of proper feed according to the contract, by reason of which a part of the 268 died and were lost, that the plaintiffs assume that they have a right to recover possession of the property without making any compensation to Bilby for his services.

A large amount of testimony was submitted to the jury on both sides with regard to this question of proper feeding, care, and attention, without objection apparently by either party, as well as instructions asked of the court to the jury upon these subjects, and the consequences of the supposed failure on the part of Bilby to comply with his contract. The exceptions taken to the general charge of the judge are also numerous, and many of them too unimportant to receive special notice at our hands.

A principal question, and the most important one in the case, arises out of the fact that Bilby gave testimony of a subsequent oral agreement changing very materially the terms of the written contract. The bill of exceptions which relates to the evidence introduced on this subject reads as follows:

"The defendant introduced evidence tending to show that the appearance of the cattle when they were delivered to him by the plaintiffs would not disclose the treatment they had received previously, and that it required time to develop the evil effects of such treatment; that although the cattle might appear to be very thin and weak, yet it would not be apparent that they were diseased; on the contrary, experienced cattle men might well suppose that they would, upon the treatment provided for in the contract, soon recover their flesh and strength.

"He also introduced testimony tending to show, not only the death of two hundred and sixty-eight of the cattle as aforesaid, but that as to many of the others that survived the winter of 1880 and 1881, although they were fed upon corn, all they could eat during the winter, they always presented a scabby appearance and did not thrive from their food, and that when the spring came they were placed upon grass. They did not shed their hair, but were, in the language of a number of the witnesses, 'stuck cattle.'

"And that upon an examination of the cattle, it was considered by said Coleman and defendant that the cattle could not be wintered on hay, straw, and stalk fields; and it was a few days thereafter finally agreed upon between Coleman and defendant that defendant should let the cattle into corn, and whatever time that they went into corn that winter should be deducted off of the corn feed next year at the end of the next grain feeding, and that defendant should also be released from the stipulation of the written contract requiring him to increase the average weight of the cattle four hundred and fifty pounds per head."

While this testimony does not seem to have been objected to at the time it was offered and permitted to go to the jury, the counsel of plaintiffs in error, in several prayers for instructions to the jury, and in objections made to what the court said to the jury, set forth the proposition that this being an attempt to substitute a verbal contract, or change of contract, for a written one, it must be made clear that, so far as it changed the obligation of Bilby, it was made upon a good consideration; and they in various ways object to the rights of the parties being governed by this supposed change in the contract. It is an answer to a very large amount of what is said on this subject that the testimony in regard to it was permitted to go to the jury, as given by Bilby on the stand. Coleman, one of the plaintiffs, also testified in regard to this, and denied that the agreement was as stated by Bilby; and a third witness was introduced on this subject, who was present at the conversations in which the change in the agreement is said to have been made. The whole testimony upon this subject was, therefore, before the jury without objection.

It further appears that Coleman, whose interest in the cattle was as large as any of the plaintiffs, substantially remained with them during the whole period from the time they were delivered to Bilby until their replevin. Part of this time he was at Bilby's house, and the remainder somewhere in the neighborhood, giving his attention closely to the cattle, as one of the plaintiffs, who were the real owners.

It is also manifest, from the testimony offered, that the cattle were not in good condition to go through the winter without other food than the hay, straw, and stalk fields, which was all that Bilby was bound to furnish them, until grass came in the spring, but that some other kind of food was necessary to prepare them for this. Of this Coleman, who was present superintending them and had a right to control the matter, was the best judge, and the most interested. It must also have been apparent to Bilby that if the cattle entered upon the grass in the spring in an enfeebled condition, or if many of them died during the winter, he would not be able to return them in October or December with an average increase of 450 pounds, according to the contract. It was, therefore, to the mutual interest of the parties to make some different arrangements, by which Bilby should furnish the cattle more nutritious food during the autumn and winter, and that he should also, in consideration of that change, be relieved of his obligation to bring them up to an average increase of 450 pounds.

It is hardly pretended by counsel for plaintiffs that it was not competent, after the written contract was made and signed by the parties, for them to make another verbal contract in regard to some parts of it, which to that extent should be a substitute for the first one. There is nothing in the nature of the contract itself requiring it to be in writing; nor is there any principle making it necessary that the new one should be reduced to writing because the first was written. 1 Greenl. Ev. § 308; Goss v. Nugent, 5 Barn. & Ad. 58; Lattimore v. Harsen, 14 Johns. 330; Munroe v. Perkins, 9 Pick. 298.

What the judge said to the jury on the subject of the modification of the contract is in substance as follows: that it was set up by Bilby, and he was bound to prove it; that the written contract must prevail unless a change or modification of its terms is proved to your satisfaction; you should inquire whether there was a reason or necessity for the change; the parties alike interested in preserving the cattle were upon the ground; the cattle were dying in large numbers from some cause; would a change of food suggest itself to meet the contingency? If so, there would be a reason and a motive for that change. He then recites what Bilby says about the contract, and Coleman's denial of it, and that an unimpeached witness was called by Bilby to whom Bilby had repeated the agreement in the presence of Coleman; that a number of witnesses testify the cattle were put upon corn about the time that the change was claimed to have been made in the contract; and other testimony was given of the acts, conversations, and admissions of the parties, both for and against the change. From all this, he says, you must determine whether there was any change, and if you find that there was, what it was; if you find, however, that there was no modification or change, then the written contract remained in full force.

We are of opinion that this charge, the substance of which only is given by us, fairly placed before the jury the law which governed the proof and effect of that contract in the case, and that no other instructions upon that subject were necessary to enable them to arrive at a just verdict, so far as that was affected by the supposed change of contract.

Another error is alleged in regard to the charge of the court, and its refusal to grant prayers for instructions by the plaintiff, relative to the conclusiveness of Bass' action in passing upon the cattle as they arrived at Council Bluffs, as being average lots with the train load which had already arrived and been seen by Mr. Bilby. A portion of the testimony which we have already cited tended to show that, when the cattle were delivered to Bilby by the plaintiffs, their appearance would not disclose the bad treatment they had previously received, but that it required time to develop the evil effects of such treatment. Much other testimony was introduced on the same subject, tending to show that Bass was misled as to the real condition of the cattle when he inspected them, and also that he was influenced by partiality towards plaintiffs, who employed him, not only in regard to the cattle now in controversy, but other cattle, as a broker or agent.

To the reception of all this testimony there is no exception; and it affords sufficient reason, in our opinion, why the court should not have charged peremptorily, as requested by plaintiffs, that Bass' examination of these cattle and passing them was conclusive that they were in proper condition and came up to the requirements of the contract. We think it was a question for the jury, under all the circumstances, to decide whether they were equal to the lot first examined by Bilby.

On that subject the judge said to the jury: "It is only in case Bass was himself deceived by plaintiffs, in not putting him, Bass, in full possession of the knowledge possessed by them and necessary for proper discharge of his, Bass', duties as arbitrator, that you can go behind Bass' acts. Then, if the cattle of the Teal herd were infected by a disease incurred through careless handling, want of sufficient or proper food or water, and such disease could not be discovered by a careful examination, which Bass is presumed to have made, in such a case the plaintiffs were bound, if they knew of such disease, to disclose it to Bass or Bilby, and their failure to do so was a fraud upon Bilby; and if damages have resulted to him, Bilby, in consequence, he is entitled to recover them in this action."

We see no objection to this charge, which is the one complained of by plaintiffs in error.

A third question, to which some importance is attached, arises out of the language of the contract, and the action of Bilby under it, in regard to the hides of the cattle which should die while they were under his control. This language which immediately succeeds the agreement as to the responsibility for cattle lost, strayed or stolen, or dying through the neglect or carelessness of Bilby, is as follows: "If any steers shall die, John S. Bilby shall preserve the hides as evidence of death, and the ears if there are any ear marks." Of the 268 steers not on hand at the time Bilby proposed to deliver the remainder of the cattle to the plaintiffs, the hides were not produced. It is insisted by plaintiffs that the failure to produce these hides makes him responsible for the value of the steers. Evidence, however, was offered by Bilby tending to show that during the winter in which these cattle died he had produced the hides to Coleman, counted them to him, and requested him to accept the delivery of them. There was also testimony to prove that during the succeeding summer the hides decayed and became offensive, and could not be produced at the time the cattle were to be delivered.

The question of these hides is considered in two aspects by the court in its charge to the jury, and in both we think it is justly treated. The first charge, which related to the evidence of the hides as tending to show the loss of the cattle which Bilby was otherwise bound to account for, is in the following language:

"Bilby, under the written contract, was to preserve the hides of the cattle which died and the ears of any which had ear marks. Under this provision Bilby was bound to preserve the hides of all the cattle which died; and unless he has done so, he is bound to account for the whole of the 1,500 cattle, less such as he has preserved the hides of, or the preservation of them was agreed to be waived.

"There is testimony showing the number of hides preserved by Bilby, and as to an agreement with plaintiff Coleman waiving the preserving of some of them. If the whole of the steers which are claimed to have died have thus been accounted for to your satisfaction, Bilby cannot be held responsible, provided they all died through unavoidable causes, and not through the neglect or carelessness of Bilby, as already instructed. The offer to count the hides, claimed by Bilby to have been made to Coleman, if made as claimed, and the count actually made as testified to, if satisfactorily proven, may be taken by you as showing that Bilby had the number of hides claimed. There are no provisions in the contract where the hides of cattle which had died should be counted; and the reasonable construction thereupon is that the hides preserved should be counted at the time, and with a view of making the hides themselves available for use or sale."

In charging the jury in reference to the damages which the plaintiffs might recover, he afterwards said: "Under the written contract, the plaintiffs are entitled to the hides of the cattle which unavoidably died. Unless you find that a tender of these was made by defendant to plaintiffs, in which latter case the defendant would not be liable for them, there is no proof before you as to the value of the hides, and in order to recover their value the plaintiffs would have to show it; the hides seem to be out of the question even if defendant's tender was invalid."

It is seriously urged in argument by counsel that this latter charge concerning the value of the hides was misleading, as tending to divert the jury from the consideration of the failure to produce the hides as evidence of the death and loss of the cattle, and exempting Bilby from responsibility for these cattle. But it is too clear for argument that, in that part of the charge first cited, he points their attention to that aspect of the failure to produce the hides, and to the consideration which should govern the jury in that respect, in charging Bilby or in releasing him from responsibility for their loss; while in the second and later part of the charge he is considering the mere moneyed value of the hides, and charges the jury that the plaintiffs cannot recover for that, because they have made no proof of such value.

While there are other assignments of error that have been examined by us, we do not perceive that any of them are well founded, nor do we think that they are worthy of any extended inquiry. As these, to which we have adverted, are the most important, and as we see no error in what the court charged or refused to charge the jury on these subjects, and as we have already said there is no exception to the introduction of testimony, we see no error in the record, and the judgment of the court below is, in each case, affirmed.

WILLIAM H. CRAFT ET AL.

Fraudulent preference—void bill of sale—fraudulent stipulation—questions on division.

1. Where there was an understanding between a bank and a borrower of money, that if the bank would lend him money from time to time, and anything should occur by which he was not able to pay his debts, he would secure the bank, it is a question of fact and not one of law whether such agreement is fraudulent or not.

2. Where the borrower sold his stock in trade to the bank to pay such indebtedness, the question whether the bill of sale was rendered void as to other creditors by containing a stipulation that the bank should employ such borrower in the business at a stipulated price per month, so long as the bank should continue the business, and whether such a stipulation was valid or invalid, depends upon its intention. If its object was to secure a benefit to the debtor or his family, it would be fraudulent in law; but if its sole purpose was to obtain services necessary to wind up the business and turn the goods into money, for the benefit of the other party, it is valid.

3. It cannot be concluded, as matter of law, that the compensation was unreasonable, or that the stipulation in question was fraudulent; whether it was fraudulent in fact was a question to be decided by the trial court.

4. The whole case cannot be referred to the decision of this court upon a certificate of division.

Mr. Justice Gray delivered the opinion of the court:

This case also comes before the court upon a certificate of division of opinion, and resembles in many respects that of Jewell v. Knight, ante, argued with it, and just decided.

It is a bill in equity by several creditors, each of whose claims is for less than $5,000, to set aside as fraudulent a sale made by their debtor, Craft, a dealer in watches and jewelry, of his whole stock in trade to Fletcher and Churchman, a banking partnership known as Fletcher's Bank.

The first question certified is whether the understanding between the bank and Craft, that if the bank would lend him money from time to time, and if anything should occur by which he was not able to pay his debts, he would secure the bank, constituted a fraud upon his other creditors, so as to invalidate the subsequent sale of his stock.

What the understanding here referred to was, or how long it had existed, can only be gathered from the statement of a different understanding at the time of the giving of the latest notes by Craft to the bank; from the recital of a conversation between Craft and Churchman on the very day when the bank was first informed of Craft's insolvency and when the bill of sale was executed; and from the other circumstances set forth in the certificate of division.

As the debtor might lawfully prefer one of his creditors if there was no actual fraud, it cannot, in the absence of any finding upon that point, be said, as matter of law, either that the previous agreement to prefer was fraudulent, or that it was not; but the question of fraud or no fraud involved a question of fact, which, if this case had been on the common-law side of the court, and either party had desired it, must have been submitted to a jury. Bank of Leavenworth v. Hunt, 78 U. S. 11 Wall. 391 [20: 190]; National Park Bank v. Whitmore 104 N. Y. 297.

The second question certified is whether the bill of sale was rendered void as to other creditors by containing a stipulation that the bank should "employ said Craft in said business at the rate of $150 per month so long as" the bank should "carry on or continue said business."

But whether such a stipulation is valid or invalid depends upon its intention. If its object appeared on its face to have been to secure a benefit to the debtor or his family, it would be fraudulent in law. Lukins v. Aird, 78 U. S. 6 Wall. 78 [18: 750]; McClurg v. Lecky, 8 Penr. & W. 83; Harris v. Sumner, 2 Pick. 129. But if its sole purpose was to obtain services necessary to wind up the business and turn the goods into money as promptly and economically as possible, for the benefit of the other party, it is valid. Wilcoxon v. Annesley, 28 Ind. 285; Baxter v. Wheeler, 9 Pick. 21; Strong v. Carrier, 17 Conn. 319. As was well said by the Supreme Court of Indiana in Wilcoxon v. Annesley: "Where, as in this case, the purchase was of a stock of goods in a store, and an established trade existing, it seems but reasonable that, at a fair salary, the grantor might be employed, for a time at least, to continue in charge of the business; and that circumstance will not in itself prove the transaction fraudulent." 28 Ind. 295.

The only facts stated in the certificate (other than the bill of sale itself), directly bearing upon the validity of the stipulation, are that the bank, with Craft as manager, carried on the business, reducing the stock as rapidly as possible, "with a view to closing it out," for about six months, when the stock remaining was sold by auction; that the bank realized for the entire stock $20,000, and Craft received the sum of $150 a month, or about $900 in all; and since the bill of sale, had no other interest, direct or indirect, in the stock of goods or its proceeds, it cannot be concluded as matter of law, either on the face of the bill of sale, or with the aid of this evidence of what was done under its provisions, that the compensation was unreasonable, or that the stipulation in question was fraudulent. Whether, taken in connection with all the previous transactions between the parties, it was fraudulent in fact, was a question to be decided by the Circuit Court.

The third question certified is clearly irregular, as avowedly referring the whole case to the decision of this court.

For these reasons, and upon the authorities collected in Jewell v. Knight, ante, this court has no authority to answer any of the questions certified, and the entry must be, appeal dismissed.

A decree binds parties and their privies.

Where one is not named as a party to a suit, but is represented in the suit by one who is a party, and under whom he claims, and he employs counsel, and puts in an answer in the name of such party, setting up title, and pays his proportion of the expenses of litigation, and controls the defense, he is bound by the decree therein.

The facts are stated by the court.

Mr. C. H. Gatch, for plaintiff in error.

Mr. George Crane, for defendant in error:

No person can have the benefit of an adjudication in an action, except the parties thereto or their privies.

328); Brooklyn C. & N. R. R. Co. v. National Bank, 102 U. S. 35 (26:69).

This is another suit brought by Edward K. Goodnow, assignee of the Iowa Homestead Company, to recover taxes paid on "Des Moines River Lands" for the years 1864 to 1871, both inclusive. For a general statement of the facts reference is made to Stryker v. Crane, ante, 194. Plumb, the plaintiff in error, was defendant below, and set up the prior adjudication in the suit of Iowa Homestead Co. v. Des Moines Nav. & R. R. Co. 84 U. S. 17 Wall. 153 [21:622] as a bar to the action. This defense was overruled, and a judgment given against him on the ground that he was not a party to that suit. Goodnow v. Plumb, 64 Iowa, 672. The judgment was not only against Plumb personally, but it was made a special lien on the lands, which were the subject of taxation, because he was the actual owner at the time of the levy. The case was treated in all material respects the same as that of Litchfield's Admr. v. Crane, ante, 199. In this there was error, in our opinion.

Edward Wade was a party to the suit as the apparent owner of the lands now in question, and which were properly described in the bill and included in the litigation. The record in this case shows that the lands were conveyed by the Navigation and Railroad Company to Plumb in 1859; and he, in 1861, conveyed them to Wade in trust as security for a debt he owed a bank. This deed was duly recorded in the proper recording office. In 1865 the lands were sold by Wade under his trust, and conveyed to Edward Wesley, for the sole use and benefit of Plumb. This deed was not put on record before the suit of the Homestead Company was begun. As soon as Plumb heard of the suit he employed counsel, and had an answer filed in the name of Wade, setting up a defense to the claim of the company, and asserting that the superior title was in those who held under the river grant. He paid his proportion of the expenses of the litigation, and controlled the defense, so far as Wade was concerned. His interests in the suit were properly represented by Wade, whom he allowed to appear on the records of the county as the real owner of the lands. If there had been a decree against Wade for the taxes, and a lien therefor established on the lands, he would have been bound, and could not have resisted the enforcement of the lien. So, too, if a personal decree had been rendered against Wade for the money, it would have been conclusive in an action by Wade to recover from him money paid for his use in satisfaction of the decree. He was bound, because he was represented in the suit by Wade, under whom he claimed. This case is the converse of that of Litchfield's Admr. v. Crane, ante, 199. There Mrs. Litchfield was not represented in the suit by anyone who was a party, and, therefore, she could not claim the benefit of the decree. Here Plumb was represented by Wade, and he stands, consequently, as if he had been himself a party by name.

There were other questions in the case that might have been considered by the court below, but as they were not, and the decision was put entirely on the ground that Plumb was not a party to the decree which was pleaded in bar, we need not pass upon them here.

Because, therefore, the court failed to give due faith and credit to the decree of the court which was pleaded in bar, we reverse the judgment, and remand the cause for further proceedings not inconsistent with this opinion.

Reissued patent—claims in—infringement of.

1. A patentee, who has imposed words of limitation upon himself in his claims, especially when so required by the patent office in taking out his reissue, is bound by such limitation in subsequent suits on the reissued patent.

2. Claims of a patent for a combination of parts which are found in reversed position in a former device are to be construed as covering only the precise combinations described.

3. Claims 1 and 2 of reissued letters patent No. 9208, granted July 12, 1881, to George W. Heyl, for an improvement in devices for inserting metallic staples, do not cover the defendant's device called the "Victor Tool," and are not infringed thereby.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Pennsylvania. Reversed.

The case is stated by the court.

Mr. Hector T. Fenton, for appellant:

The case presents facts like those in Saxby v. Gloucester Waggon Co., 7 L. R. Q. B. Div. 305, cited in Gardner v. Herz, 118 U. S. 180 (30:158); and is controlled by the decisions in the latter case, as well as by Thatcher Heating Co. v. Burtis, 121 U. S. 286 (30:942), which is a parallel case; and see also Clark Pomace Holder Co. v. Ferguson, 119 U. S. 335 (30:406); Thompson v. Boisselier, 114 U. S. 1 (29:76), and Yale Lock Mfg. Co. v. Greenleaf, 117 U. S. 554 (29:952).

If it is possible to sustain this patent for any purpose, it must be for the precise device shown in the drawings and described in the specification.

Bragg v. Fitch, 121 U. S. 484 (30:1010); Snow v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. 121 U. S. 629 (30:1008); Thompson v. Boisselier, 114 U. S. 13 (29:80); White v. Dunbar, 119 U. S. 47 (30:303); Sutter v. Robinson, 119 U. S. 541 (30:495).

The record and proof show a bar, by reason of laches, from asserting anything by reason of this reissue, beyond the matter of the first claim only, which is substantially the same as the fourth claim of the original.

Miller v. Bridgeport Brass Co. 104 U. S. 350 (26:783) Mahn v. Harwood, 112 U. S. 354 (28:665); Wollensak v. Reiher, 115 U. S. 99 (29:351); Ives v. Sargent, 119 U. S. 652 (30:544).

Mr. Joshua Pusey, for appellees.

Mr. Justice Blatchford delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a bill in equity filed in the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Pennsylvania, by Isaac W. Heysinger, Christian H. Hershey, and J. Loren Heysinger, against James P. Crawford, founded on the alleged infringement of reissued letters patent

No. 9,803, granted July 12, 1881, to George W. Heyl, assignee of Henry R. Heyl, the inventor, for an "improvement in devices for inserting metallic staples," the application for the reissue having been filed May 10, 1881, and the original patent, No. 195,603, having been granted to Henry R. Heyl, September 25, 1877, on an application filed September 20, 1877. Henry R. Heyl assigned the original patent to George W. Heyl, March 20, 1878, and George W. Heyl assigned the reissued patent to the plaintiffs, November 23, 1881. This bill was filed June 9, 1883. The answer of the defendant sets up as defenses the invalidity of the reissue, want of novelty, and noninfringement. After issue joined, proofs were taken, and the circuit court, in November, 1883, entered an interlocutory decree, adjudging the reissued patent to be valid as respects claims 1 and 2, and that those claims had been infringed by the defendant, and awarding a perpetual injunction, and referring it to a master to take an account of profits and damages. On his report, a final decree was entered, in May, 1884, in favor of the plaintiffs, for $225.75 damages, and for costs.

In order to consider any question involved as to the reissue, it is necessary to compare the specifications of the original and reissued patents. They are here placed in parallel columns, the parts of each which are not found in the other being in italics, the drawings in the two being substantially alike, with only immaterial differences in the lettering:

Reissue.

"To all whom it may concern: Be it known that I, Henry R. Heyl, of the City and County of Philadelphia and State of Pennsylvania, have invented a new and useful improvement in paper fasteners, which improvement is fully set forth in the following specification and accompanying drawings, in which Figures 1 and 5 are side elevations of the fastener embodying my invention. Fig. 2 is a vertical section in line x x, Fig. 1. Fig. 3 is a side elevation, partly sectional. Fig. 4 is a horizontal section in line y y, Fig. 1. Similar letters of reference indicate corresponding parts in the several figures.

"My invention consists of an implement of the form of a hand stamp, by which metallic staples may be forced through sheets of paper or documents, and secured by clinching the legs on the reverse side.

"Referring to the drawings, A' represents a stationary anvil, which is secured to or formed with an arm rising from a suitable stand of convenient form for use upon a writing desk; and B represents a sliding guide block fitted to the anvil A' by a sliding joint, and having grooves C C, which match with the tongue of the anvil, the upper face of the block being flat. The normal position of the guide B is elevated; and in order to keep it in this position, or from dropping prematurely, I employ a spring, D, which may press up under the guide, or a spring, D', which may press against it, and thus produce the necessary friction. E represents a reciprocating driver, whose under face is flat; and in the same is a concave recess, F, said driver having a knob, G, for receiving the blows of the hand, and provided with a spring, H, for causing the return or elevation of the driver.

"The operation is as follows: A staple is placed within the grooves C C, with its crown resting on the anvil A', the points thus being turned toward the bending recess F. The papers to be united are now placed beneath the driver, and by a sharp blow of the hand upon the knob G, the driver is forced downward upon the papers. The staple legs come through the papers into the recess F, where they are bent over by the slanting ends thereof.

latter then rising, and the papers are drawn somewhat forward, until the staple crown rests upon the face of the guide B, when another blow is imparted to the driver, and the flat portion of its face descends forcibly on the staple legs, so as to bend the latter close to the paper, thus completing the operation.

"It will be seen that the grooves C C serve to support and guide the staple legs during their penetration though the papers, and the recess F is so shaped that, as the staple legs enter thereinto, they will strike the concave or slanting walls of said recess, and thus be bent inward toward each other sufficiently to insure their being bent down properly when again struck between the faces of the guide B and driver E. A plate, a, may be advantageously employed to overlap the staple crown, for preventing the latter from binding while the legs are being forced through the papers.

"It will be seen that the grooves C C serve to support and guide the staple legs during their penetration through the papers, and the recess F is so shaped that, as the staple legs enter thereinto, they will strike the concave or slanting walls of said recess, and thus be bent inward toward each other, as shown in Figs. 2 and 3. A plate, a, may be advantageously employed to overlap the staple crown, for preventing the latter from bending while the legs are being forced through the papers.

"It will be seen that the staple support or anvil A,' with the slotted or recessed hammer, operates to insert a staple through layers of stock to be united, and simultaneously bends over its projecting ends.

"In my original specification I described the further separate operation of completely flattening down the ends of the staple thus bent over, by a second blow between the upper and lower jaw of the implement, believing that the same was new; but I have since learned that the same result was obtained by devices described in previous letters patent of the United States. Should the legs of the staple, when bent over by the same blow which drives the same, as is hereinabove described, be found not to lie sufficiently close to the surface of the paper, the same may be further flattened down by a second blow between flat surfaces in front of the staple channel and bending recess, respectively, provided therefor.

"Figs. 1, 2, and 3 show a hand stamp embodying my invention, in which the driver reciprocates in a fixed head in the manner of a plunger, while Fig. 5 shows the same invention embodied in a hand stamp in which the driver is mounted at the end of a vibrating arm pivoted at its rear extremity to the base, which rests upon the table. It will be seen that the devices which constitute my invention are to be found in both these modifications, and that both operate in precisely the same manner, to insert by a blow upon the knob G of the hand stamp, the staple through layers of stock to be united, and simultaneously bend over the projecting ends in the opposite bending recess provided therefor.

"Having thus described my invention, what I claim as new, and desire to secure by letters patent, is—

"1. The reciprocating driver E, constructed with a flat face recessed substantially as described, whereby the projecting ends of staples may be first bent over by entering the recess and then flattened down by pressure from the flat face.

"2. The self-adjusting guide block B, having staple guiding grooves C C and a flat face, upon which to complete the clinching of the staple substantially as and for the purpose set forth.

"3. The combination of the stationary staple support or anvil A with the sliding guide B, grooved to partially embrace and guide the staple legs, substantially as and for the purpose set forth.

"4. The combination of the stationary staple support or anvil A with the reciprocating slotted or recessed hammer, operating to insert a staple through layers of stock to be united, and simultaneously bend over its projecting ends, substantially as and for the purpose set forth."

"Having thus described my invention, what I claim as new, and desire to secure by letters patent, is—

"1. The combination of the stationary staple support or anvil A', and the sliding staple guide B, with the reciprocating slotted or recessed hammer, operating to insert a staple through layers of stock to be united, and simultaneously bend over its projecting ends, substantially as and for the purpose set forth.

"2. In a device for inserting metallic staples, the combination of the staple guide B, anvil A', spring D, and reciprocating driver, provided with the knob G, the whole arranged to operate substantially as and for the purpose set forth.

"3. A staple-inserting implement having two opposite jaws arranged with relation to each other, substantially as shown, one of which is provided with a recess, the other with a vertically channeled staple guide, an anvil, and a spring, so that when the jaws are separated, after driving a staple, the guide will be open for the reception of the succeeding staple, substantially as described.

"4. An implement for inserting metallic staples, consisting of two opposite jaws, one of which is provided with a staple-bending recess, and the other with staple-guiding grooves and an anvil fitted thereto, in combination with a knob to receive the blow of the hand and insert a staple by a sudden percussion, substantially as described.

"5. In a staple-inserting machine constructed to operate substantially as described, the staple-guiding block B, having staple-holding grooves C C, forming side extensions of the vertical slot S, substantially as shown and described.

"6. An implement for inserting metallic staples, consisting of two opposite jaws, one of which is provided with a staple-bending recess, and the other with staple-guiding grooves and an anvil fitted therein, the said jaws being arranged to be separated and stand apart, to admit the requisite manipulation for conveniently placing a staple in the open end of the staple-guiding grooves substantially as set forth.

"7. The combination of the stationary staple support or anvil A' with the sliding-guide B, grooved to partially embrace and guide the staple legs, substantially as and for the purpose set forth.

"8. In an implement for inserting metallic staples, a reciprocating driver provided with a knob to receive the blow of the hand, in combination with a grooved staple-guiding block and an anvil attached to a stand of convenient form for use upon a writing desk, the said stand having an arm arising therefrom, and over and above it a guide for the purpose of guiding the said driver to the said anvil, substantially as and for the purpose set forth."

The differences which thus appear in the descriptive parts of the specification are these:

In the original, in stating the operation of the machine, it is said that the points of the staple point "upward" when the staple is within the grooves. In the reissue, it is stated that those points are "turned toward the bending recess F."

In the original, it is said that the papers to be united are "placed upon the face of the guide B over the staple points." In the reissue, it is said that the papers to be united are "placed beneath the driver."

In the original, it is said that "The guide B gives way, and the staple legs come up through the papers into the recess F, where they are bent over preparatory to the final clinching." In the reissue, it is said that "The staple legs come through the papers into the recess F, where they are bent over by the slanting ends thereof."

The original then contains the following statement, which is wholly omitted in the reissue: "The hand is now released from the knob of the driver, the latter then rising, and the papers are drawn somewhat forward, until the staple crown rests upon the face of the guide B, when another blow is imparted to the driver, and the flat portion of its face descends forcibly on the staple legs, so as to bend the latter close to the paper, thus completing the operation."

The reissue omits the statement of the original, that as the staple legs strike the slanting walls of the recess, they will be bent inward toward each other sufficiently to insure their being bent down properly when again struck between the faces of the guide B and driver E, and substitutes the statement that when the staple legs strike the slanting walls of the recess they will be bent inward toward each other, as shown in Figures 2 and 3.

The following sentence, not in the original, is found in the reissue: "It will be seen that the staple support or anvil A', with the slotted or recessed hammer, operates to insert a staple through layers of stock to be united, and simultaneously bends over its projecting ends."

The specification of the reissue then states that the separate operation described in the original, of flattening down by a second blow the ends of the staple when bent over, was not new, but that the legs of the staple, if not laid sufficiently close to the surface of the paper, when bent over by the driving blow, may be further flattened down by a second blow between flat surfaces.

Figure 5 of the drawings, though contained in the drawings of the original patent, was not described or referred to in the original specification; but the reissued specification speaks of Figures 1, 2, and 3 as showing a hand stamp in which the driver reciprocates in a fixed head in the manner of a plunger, while Figure 5 shows a hand stamp in which the driver is mounted at the end of a vibrating arm, pivoted at its rear extremity to the base which rests upon the table; that the devices which constitute the invention are found in both of these modifications; and that both operate to insert, by a blow upon the knob G of the hand stamp, a staple through layers of stock to be united, and to simultaneously bend over the projecting ends in the opposite bending recess provided therefor.

On the question of novelty, the alleged prior invention principally relied upon is a patent of the United States, No. 187189, granted to George L. Ward and Orianna S. Smyth, assignees of James C. Smyth, February 6, 1877, for an "improvement in machines for stitching books with staples."

The circuit court, in its opinion accompanying the record, held that the patented invention was not anticipated by that of Smyth; that claims 1 and 2 of the reissue were substantially the same as claim 4 of the original patent, when the latter claim was read in the light of the specification; and that the defendant's device infringed claims 1 and 2 of the reissue.

Claim 1 of the reissue is for a combination of (1) the stationary staple support or anvil; (2) the sliding staple guide; and (3) the reciprocating slotted or recessed hammer or driver; the conjoined operation of the three being to insert a staple through layers of stock to be united, and to simultaneously bend over its projecting ends. Claim 2 of the reissue is for a combination with the same three elements, of (4) the spring D, and (5) the knob G. Claim 4 of the original patent was for a combination of only two of these elements, namely, (1) the stationary staple support or anvil and (2) the reciprocating slotted or recessed hammer or driver. It left out the sliding staple guide, and yet the claim stated that the combination of the two elements, without the staple guide, would operate to insert the staple and simultaneously bend over its projecting ends. It would, however, wholly fail to so operate without the use of the sliding staple guide. The use and operation of the sliding staple guide, its arrangement so as to slide, the use of the spring D to keep it in its normal elevated position so that it will not drop prematurely, and the use of the knob G, with which to impel the driver, are fully set forth in the original specification, and described as necessary, in combination with the stationary staple support and the reciprocating slotted or recessed hammer, to insert a staple through layers of stock and simultaneously bend over its projecting ends; and the invention is stated, in the original specification, to consist in a hand stamp by which metallic staples may be forced through sheets of "paper documents" and secured by clinching the legs on the reverse side.

We do not find it necessary, however, to decide whether the reissue is to be considered a proper one, so far as claims 1 and 2, rightly construed, are concerned, on the view that it was an inadvertence, accident, or mistake to have left out of claim 4 of the original the elements which, by the description in the original specification, were made necessary to the performance of the operation specified in that claim. We dispose of the case on the assumption that the reissued patent is valid as respects claims 1 and 2.

What is the proper construction of those claims? In claim 1, the staple support or anvil is described as being "stationary," and the slotted or recessed hammer or driver as being "reciprocating." In claim 2, the anvil must be regarded as a "stationary" anvil, and the hammer or driver is expressly stated to be "reciprocating." In claim 4 of the original, the staple support or anvil is said to be "stationary," and the slotted or recessed hammer to be "reciprocating." So in claim 1 of the original, the driver is said to be "reciprocating," and in claim 3 of the original the staple support or anvil is said to be "stationary." In the description in the original specification, the anvil is described as being "a stationary anvil," and the hammer or driver as being a "reciprocating driver." In the specification of the reissue, the staple support is described as being "a stationary anvil," and the driver or hammer as being "a reciprocating driver."

The file wrapper and contents in the matter of the reissue are part of the evidence in the case, and throw light upon what should be the proper construction of claims 1 and 2. The application for the reissue was filed May 10, 1881. In the application as then presented eleven claims were proposed, the first and ninth of which were as follows:

"1. The staple guide B, driving head A', operating therein, recessed bending block E, spring D, and knob G, combined and operating substantially as and for the purpose set forth."

"9. The combination of the anvil or driving head A' with the reciprocating slotted or recessed hammer, operating to insert a staple through layers of stock to be united, and simultaneously bend over the projecting ends, substantially as and for the purpose set forth."

On the 12th of May, 1881, the applicant canceled claims 1 and 9, and converted claim 9 into a new claim 1, and claim 1 into a new claim 2, as follows:

"1. The combination of the stationary staple support or anvil A' with the reciprocating slotted or recessed hammer, operating to insert a staple through layers of stock to be united and simultaneously bend over its projecting ends, substantially as and for the purpose set forth.

"2. In a device for inserting metallic staples, the combination of the staple guide B, anvil A', operating therein, spring D, recess F, and knob G, the whole arranged to operate substantially as and for the purpose described."

On the 14th of May, 1881, the examiner notified the applicant as follows: "Upon further consideration of this matter, in connection with amended specification, applicant is advised that the 1st clause of claim does not present an operative combination of mechanical devices for the purpose stated. It is obvious that without a staple holding device the parts enumerated would be inoperative, in view of which a staple-holding device should be included. In reference to the 2d and 3d clauses of claim, the statement that the anvil operates in the guide block is unwarranted, inasmuch as the anvil is stationary and the guide block slides up and down upon the anvil. With proper correction as to this point, the 2d and 3d clauses of claim may be allowed."

On the 31st of May, 1881, the applicant adopted the suggestions of the examiner and amended claim 1, by inserting after the words "stationary staple support or anvil A'," the words "and the sliding staple guide B," and amended claim 2 by canceling the words "operating therein," so that claims 1 and 2 then read as follows:

"1. The combination of the stationary staple support or anvil A' and the sliding staple guide B with the reciprocating slotted or recessed hammer, operating to insert a staple through layers of stock to be united and simultaneously bend over its projecting ends, substantially as and for the purpose set forth.

"2. In a device for inserting metallic staples, the combination of the staple guide B, anvil A', spring D, recess F, and knob G, the whole arranged to operate substantially as and for the purpose described."

On the 4th of June, 1881, the examiner notified the applicant as follows: "Upon further consideration of this matter, in connection with the last amendment, it is obvious that the 'recess F' should not form an element of the mechanical combination, as such recess is a provision of the 'hammer' referred to in the first clause of claim, and such recess is not an operative element independent of such hammer."

On the 14th of June, 1881, the applicant made further amendments, leaving claim 1 as last recited, and as it is found in the reissued patent, and amending claim 2, as last recited, by striking out the words "recess F," so that it read as follows:

"2. In a device for inserting metallic staples, the combination of the staple guide B, anvil A', spring D, and knob G, the whole arranged to operate substantially as and for the purpose described."

On the 15th of June, 1881, the examiner notified the applicant as follows: "Upon further consideration of this matter, with a view to final action, the 2d clause of claim is found defective, in the absence of any mechanical combination between the 'knob G' and the other elements included in the combination. To obviate this objection a 'reciprocating driver' should be added to the combination."

On the 18th of June, 1881, the applicant amended claim 2 by substituting for the words "and knob G" the words "and reciprocating driver provided with the knob G," so that the claim, as thus amended, read as follows, the same as claim 2 in the reissued patent:

"2. In a device for inserting metallic staples, the combination of the staple guide B, anvil A', spring D, and reciprocating driver provided with the knob G, the whole arranged to operate substantially as and for the purpose set forth."

From these proceedings in the patent office, in regard to the allowance of claims 1 and 2 of the reissued patent, it is apparent that the applicant carefully limited himself, in those claims, to a stationary staple support or anvil and a reciprocating slotted or recessed hammer or driver. This result must also follow in view of the devices existing in the various prior patents introduced in evidence, showing the state of the art. The various elements entering into the combinations of claims 1 and 2 of the reissue were old, considered singly. The recessed clinching base was old; the driver in the staple case was old; the combination of those two devices in a power machine was old. The J. C. Smyth machine was a hand lever machine, and contained in combination all the elements of the Heyl device, though differently arranged. In both the Smyth and the Heyl devices there are means of forcing out a staple from a case by a contained plunger, and bending the legs against a concave recess. In view of this Smyth machine, the plaintiffs' expert stated that the novelty of the Heyl devices consisted particularly "in the automatic adjustment to various thicknesses of paper, by means of which, without any added parts, the jaws are adapted to grip and hold all thicknesses of paper while being stapled and clinched; in their capacity for being opened to allow the eye to see the staple while being inserted by hand at the open end of the staple case, whereby a length of staple may be adapted or selected to suit the material; in the retracting spring to keep the staple case constantly open for a new staple; in a hand knob for driving down the plunger; and in the general construction and adaptation of all the parts to be used as a light, portable desk tool, low in price, simple in construction and operation, and of universal use."

In prior devices, the clinching part was the base and the inserting device was above it. This arrangement did not permit of the proper support of the staple in the tube. Heyl reversed the position of the parts, and placed the inserting device on the base, so that the staple could be inserted by hand into the open mouth of the tube, and be supported, until it should be driven, by the tube and its contained driver; this reversal of the parts necesitating the use of a spring underneath, to support the tube and keep it above the end of the driving blade, or of a spring at the side to press against the guide and keep it in place by friction. Claims 1 and 2 of the reissued patent must therefore be limited to the specific combinations and arrangements of parts described and shown in the specification and drawings, and enumerated in those claims. The staple support or anvil must be stationary, and the slotted or recessed hammer or driver must be reciprocating.

In the defendant's device called the "Victor tool," the anvil or staple blade is movable, and the recessed clinching base is fixed or stationary. It is a device constructed under and in accordance with letters-patent No. 218227, granted to William J. Brown, Jr., August 5, 1879, and a second patent, No. 260865, granted to the same person July 4, 1882. The drawings of No. 260865 are as follows:

An expert for the plaintiffs testifies that he regards the lower part of the defendant's device, which is fixed or stationary and contains the clinching cavity, and resists the driving and clinching blow of the hand from the opposite part of the tool, as the equivalent for the "reciprocating driver provided with the knob G," mentioned in claim 2 of the reissue. As the defendant's tool is constructed with the stationary recessed clinching base made to rest upon a table, and to receive the impact from above of the detached driving tool, it is a misnomer to say that such stationary base is the mechanical equivalent of the reciprocating driver E of the Heyl patent. The patentee having imposed words of limitation upon himself in his claims, especially when so required by the patent office in taking out his reissue, is bound by such limitations, in subsequent suits on the reissued patents. Such have been the uniform decisions of this court in like cases. Leggett v. Avery, 101 U. S. 256 [25:865]; Goodyear Dental V. Co. v. Davis, 102 U. S. 222, 228 [26:149,151]; Fay v. Cordesman, 109 U. S. 408 [27:979]; Mahn v. Harwood, 112 U.S. 354, 359 [28:665,667]; U. S. Cartridge Co. v. Union Met. Cartridge Co. 112 U. S. 624, 644 [28:828, 834]; Sargent v. Hall Safe & L. Co. 114 U. S. 63 [29:67]; Shepard v. Carrigan, 116 U. S. 593 [29:723]; White v. Dunbar, 119 U. S. 47 [30:303]; Sutter v. Robinson, 119 U. S. 530 [30:492]; Bragg v. Fitch, 121 U.S. 478 [30:1008]; Snow v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. 121 U. S. 617 [30:1004].

Assuming, therefore, that claims 1 and 2 of the reissued patent are valid, they are to be construed as covering only the precise combinations enumerated in them and described in the specification and shown in the drawings; and they do not cover the defendant's device, which has a stationary recessed clincher and a movable detached staple inserting tool, because claims 1 and 2 of the reissued patent expressly call for a reciprocating clincher and a stationary staple supporting anvil. Those elements, in those forms, in claims 1 and 2, were made necessary by the requirements of the patent office, before it would grant the reissue; and the applicant, having voluntarily made the limitations, is bound by them.

Although, in the proofs, the plaintiffs undertook to show that three other claims of the reissued patent, in addition to claims 1 and 2, were infringed by the "Victor tool," the circuit court, in its interlocutory decree, states that it considered only claims 1 and 2; and, as the decree holds those claims alone to be valid and to have been infringed, and the master's report and the final decree apply only to those claims, and the counsel for the plaintiffs does not contend, in his brief, that any other claim is infringed, we necessarily have confined our consideration of the case to those two claims, leaving all questions as to every other claim of the reissued patent entirely open for consideration in a case which may involve them.

The decree of the Circuit Court is reversed, and the case is remanded to that court, with a direction to dismiss the bill of complaint.

CLEMENT HUGH HILL ET AL.

Jurisdiction as to amount—revenue law.

1. In an action on the official bond of the clerk of the district court, for not accounting for moneys in his hands, although the bond is in the penal sum of $20,000, yet where the record shows that the value of the matter in dispute does not exceed $5,000, and that no recovery could be had in the action for more than $517.07, and a small amount of interest, after deducting the fees due the clerk, this court has no jurisdiction of the cause; its jurisdiction depends on the amount due for the breach of the condition, and not on the penal sum.

2. Section 844, R. S., which provides for the payment by the clerk, into the treasury, of the surplus moneys received by him as the fees and emoluments of his office, is not a revenue law within section 699, R. S., which gives jurisdiction to this court without regard to the sum in dispute.

Submitted Nov. 21, 1887. Decided Dec. 12, 1887.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Massachusetts.

On motion to dismiss. Granted.

The case is stated by the court.

Mr. John Lowell, in support of motion:

This court has no jurisdiction, because the amount in dispute is not sufficient, being only $517.07.

Hagan v. Woison, 35 U. S. 10 Pet. 160 (9:381); Parker v. Morrill, 106 U. S. 1 (27:72); New Jersey Zinc Co. v. Trotter, 108 U. S. 564 (27:828).

The amount in dispute was not the penalty, but the damages for the breach. This court always looks beyond the forms of action to ascertain whether the amount actually in dispute is sufficient.

Brown v. Shannon, 61 U. S. 20 How. 55 (15:826); Lee v. Watson, 68 U. S. 1 Wall. 337 (17:557); Gray v. Blanchard, 97 U. S. 564 (24:1103); Shacker v. Hartford F. Ins. Co. 93 U. S. 241 (23:862); Bowman v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 115 U. S. 611 (29:502); Elgin v. Marshall, 106 U. S. 578 (27:249); Bruce v. Manchester & K. R. R. Co. 117 U. S. 514 (29:990); U. S. v. McDowell, 8 U. S. 4 Cranch, 316 (2:632).

The judgment below should be affirmed, because the case is governed by U. S. v. Hill, 120 U. S. 169 (30:627).

Messrs. A. H. Garland, Atty-Gen., and William A. Maury, Asst. Atty-Gen., for plaintiff in error, opposed:

The court will not look generally beyond the amount of the damages laid in the declaration or writ.

Bennett v. Butterworth, 49 U. S. 8 How. 129 (12:1015); Hilton v. Dickinson, 108 U. S. 174 (27:691).

The law in question here is a revenue law, within the meaning of section 699, R. S., giving appellate jurisdiction to this court, without regard to the sum or value in dispute. R. S. §§ 833, 844.

The motion to affirm is founded on the judgment of this court in U. S. v. Hill, 120 U. S. 170 (30:628), as an estoppel; but no question of estoppel arises.

This is a suit brought on the official bond of Clement Hugh Hill, as Clerk of the District Court of the United States for the District of Massachusetts, for "not properly accounting for all moneys coming into his hands, as required by law, according to the condition of said bond." The bond was in the penal sum of $20,000, and in the original writ the damages were laid at $2,000. The bill of exceptions shows that the controversy in the suit was as to the liability of the clerk to account to the United States for moneys received by him in naturalization business. The questions involved are in many respects the same as in U. S. v. Hill, 120 U. S. 169 [30:627]; though in some important particulars the two cases differ.

Under the instructions of the court the jury found a verdict for the defendants on the 26th of July, 1887. On the third of August, and before judgment, the writ was amended, with leave of the court, by increasing the ad damnum from $2,000 to $20,000. Then, on the 24th of August, a judgment was entered in due form on the verdict, "that the plaintiff take nothing by the writ." To reverse that judgment this writ of error was brought, which the defendants now move to dismiss, because the value of the matter in dispute does not exceed five thousand dollars. The motion is based upon the following statement which appears as part of the bill of exceptions:

"This is an action upon the official bond of the defendants, given by the defendant Hill as clerk of the district court for this district. The pleadings are made a part of this bill of exceptions, and may be referred to. The only breach of the bond relied upon was that set out in the declaration of the failure of Hill to account for all moneys received; and, under this assignment of breach, no claim was made that the said Hill had neglected to account for any other sums or moneys than those received by him in naturalization cases. It appeared as a fact that the total amount of naturalization fees received by the defendant Hill since the date of former suit, viz, December 4, 1884, and not accounted for, was as follows:

"July to Dec., 1884	$2,720	58
"Jan. to June, 1887	838	00

"It also appeared that in 1884, adding the naturalization fees to the other fees, the two together exceeded the clerk's maximum allowance by the amount of $517.07; but since then, adding the two together, the clerk has not received the maximum allowed him by law."

As early as U. S. v. McDowell, 8 U. S. 4 Cranch, 316 [2:632], it was decided that in an action on an official bond given for the faithful performance of the duties of an office our jurisdiction would depend on the amount due for the breach of the condition, and not on the penal sum. This is not denied in the argument of the Attorney-General submitted in opposition to this motion, but he insists:

1. That it does not appear legitimately on the face of this record that the amount due is less than the penalty of the bond; and,

2. That this is a suit brought for the enforcement of a "revenue law" of the United States, and, therefore, this court has jurisdiction for the review of the judgment under § 699 of the Revised Statutes "without regard to the sum or value in dispute."

In support of the first objection, it is claimed that the foregoing statement as to the amount due from the clerk is not properly a part of the bill of exceptions. We cannot so understand the record, which shows this entry: "The following is the bill of exceptions presented to the plaintiffs and allowed by the court before entry of judgment." Then, evidently as the file mark of the paper, "Plaintiff's exceptions—Allowed August 24, 1887."

The paper itself, thus described and identified, began with the statement given above, which was evidently intended as an admission on both sides of the undisputed facts in the case, so that the trial might be confined to the real matter in dispute, to wit, the liability of the clerk to account for moneys received in naturalization business as part of his official emoluments. To show this liability, notwithstanding the case of U. S. v. Hill, ubi supra, which had been decided on an agreed statement of facts, the United States attorney offered to prove that "Hill had received large sums of money as the ordinary and usual fees upon the application of foreigners to be naturalized in the district court of which he was clerk, and for the issuance of certificates of naturalization, and for filing papers and administration of oaths, and for other official acts required by law in the naturalization in due manner of foreigners." In another part of the bill of exceptions it appears that "The attorney for the United States stated that he claimed that the fees received by said Hill in naturalization cases were those specifically provided for by statute for like acts done by the clerk in all cases; that he did not claim to recover for any sums received for services and acts which any unofficial person might do for the court, but for those sums received for acts done as clerk of the district court, which make the history of the case on the records of the court, and which cannot legally be performed by any other than a clerk of a United States court, and which are done in that capacity." Read in the light of this disclaimer, the offer of proof was no more than that "large sums" of the money, which it was admitted Hill had received in naturalization business, were for fees specifically fixed by statute, and therefore to be accounted for. Such being the case, there is nothing inconsistent between the introductory statement and the offer of proof. It is clear, therefore, that the statement was intended to be, and is in fact, a part of the record to be considered by us. Being a part of the record, it shows that the value of the matter in dispute does not exceed $5,000, because in no event could there have been a recovery in the action of more than $517.07, and possibly a small amount of interest.

The part of § 699 of the Revised Statutes which is relied on as giving us jurisdiction, notwithstanding the small amount involved, is the second subdivision, which provides for a writ of error without regard to the sum or value in dispute, upon "any final judgment of a circuit court * * * in any civil action brought by the United States for the enforcement of any revenue law thereof." The original statute, of which this is a re-enactment, was passed May 31, 1844, chap. 81, 5 Stat. at L. 658, and is as follows:

"That final judgments of any Circuit Court of the United States, in any civil action brought by the United States for the enforcement of the revenue laws of the United States, or for the collection of duties due, or alleged to be due, on merchandise imported therein, may be re-examined, and reversed or affirmed, in the Supreme Court of the United States, upon writs of error, as in other cases, without regard to the sum or value in controversy in such action, at the instance of either party."

Section 828 of the Revised Statutes provides that "The following and no other compensation shall be taxed and allowed to * * * clerks of the circuit * * * courts." "The following" here referred to is found in § 828, which prescribes the fees of a clerk. Thus far the legislation has reference only to the compensation to be paid a clerk for his services. But § 839 provides that the clerk shall be allowed to retain of the fees and emoluments of his office, for his personal compensation, a sum not exceeding $3,500 a year. Section 838 makes it his duty to report, semi-annually, to the Attorney-General, all the fees and emoluments of his office, and all necessary expenditures, with vouchers for their payment. Section 844 then requires him to pay into the Treasury any surplus of such fees and emoluments which his return shows to exist over and above the compensation and allowances authorized by law to be retained by him.

The precise question for decision is whether this section, which provides for the payment by the clerk into the Treasury of the surplus moneys received by him as the fees and emoluments of his office, is a "revenue law," within the meaning of that clause of § 699 which is relied on; and we have no hesitation in saying that it is not. As the provision relates to the jurisdiction of this court for the review of the judgments of the circuit courts, it is proper to refer to the statutes giving jurisdiction to those courts to see if there is anything there to show what the term "revenue law," as here used, means. Looking, then, to § 629 of the Revised Statutes, we find that by the fourth subdivision the circuit courts have been granted original jurisdiction "of all suits at law or in equity arising under any Act providing for revenue from imports or tonnage," and "of all causes arising under any law providing internal revenue." And again, by the twelfth subdivision, "of all suits brought by any person to recover damages for any injury to his person or property on account of any act done by him under any law of the United States for the protection or collection of any of the revenues thereof." This clearly implies that the term "revenue law," when used in connection with the jurisdiction of the Courts of the United States, means a law imposing duties on imports or tonnage, or a law providing in terms for revenue; that is to say, a law which is directly traceable to the power granted to Congress by § 8, Art. I, of the Constitution, "to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises." This view is strengthened by the third subdivision of § 699, which gives this court jurisdiction, without reference to the value in dispute, of "any final judgment of a circuit court * * * in any civil action against an officer of the revenue, for any act done by him in the performance of his official duty." Certainly it will not be claimed that the clerk of a District Court of the United States is an "officer of the revenue;" but there is nothing to indicate that the term "revenue" has any different signification in this subdivision of the section from that which it has in the other. The clerk of a Court of the United States collects his taxable "compensation," not as the revenue of the United States, but as the fees and emoluments of his office, with an obligation on his part to account to the United States for all he gets over a certain sum which is fixed by law. This obligation does not grow out of any "revenue law," properly so called, but out of a statute governing an officer of a Court of the United States.

It follows that this is a case where our jurisdiction depends on the value of the matter in dispute, and, as that is not sufficient in amount, that the motion to dismiss must be granted. It is consequently so ordered. Dismissed.

JOHN S. JOHNSON.

Jurisdiction as to amount—findings of fact, conclusive.

1. On appeal from the supreme court of a Territory, the value of the matter in dispute is to be determined by the amount due at the time of the judgment brought here for review, to wit, the judgment of the supreme court; and not at the time of the judgment of the district court of the Territory; interest must be added to the judgment of the district court until the date of that of the supreme court, for the purpose of determining the jurisdiction of this court.

2. Errors assigned, which relate only to the sufficiency of the evidence to support the findings, cannot be considered here. The findings of fact of the court below are conclusive, and cannot be re-examined here.

Submitted Nov. 21, 1887. Decided Dec. 12, 1887.

APPEAL from the Supreme Court of the Territory of Arizona.

On motion to dismiss, with which is united a motion to affirm. Motion to dismiss, denied; motion to affirm, granted.

The facts are stated by the court.

Messrs. Van H. Manning and J. B. Edmonds, for the motions:

The amount in controversy does not exceed $5,000 and this court has no jurisdiction.

The matter in dispute is that for which suit is brought.

Lee v. Watson, 68 U. S. 1 Wall. 337, 339 (17:557, 558).

The amount in dispute on appeal is no more than it was below.

Interest accruing on a judgment subsequent to its rendition cannot enter into the computation.

Knapp v. Banks, 43 U. S. 2 How. 73 (11:184); Walker v. U. S. 71 U. S. 4 Wall. 163 (18:319); Western Union Tel. Co. v. Rogers, 93 U. S. 565 (23:977); Baltimore & P. R. R. Co. v. Trook, 100 U. S. 112 (25:571); Udall v. The Ohio, 58 U. S. 17 How. 17 (15:42).

If the judgment be for the plaintiff, that ascertains the value of the matter in dispute.

A judgment was rendered September 28, 1885, by the District Court of Arizona, in and for the County of Pima, against L. Zeckendorf & Co., the appellants, and in favor of Johnson, the appellee, for $4,304.93, "with interest on $2,800 of said sum, at the rate of two per cent per month from the date hereof until paid, and interest on $1,504.33, at the rate of ten per cent per annum from the date hereof until paid." This judgment was affirmed by the Supreme Court of the Territory on appeal, November 8, 1886. From that judgment of affirmance this appeal was taken, which the appellee moves to dismiss, on the ground that the value of the matter in dispute does not exceed $5,000, as now required by law. Act of March 3, 1885, chap. 355, 23 Stat. at L. 443.

The value of the matter in dispute is to be determined by the amount due at the time of the judgment brought here for review, to wit, the judgment of the supreme court of the Territory, and not at the time of the judgment of the district court. Adding the interest to the judgment of the district court until the date of that of the supreme court, as we must for the purpose of determining our jurisdiction—The Patapsco v. Boyce, 79 U. S. 12 Wall. 451 [20:457]; N. Y. Elevated R. R. Co. v. Fifth Nat. Bank, 118 U. S. 608 [30:259]—we find that the amount due at the time of the judgment of the supreme court was considerably more than $5,000. The motion to dismiss is therefore denied.

But, on looking into the record, we discover that the errors assigned relate only to the sufficiency of the evidence to support the findings. These we cannot consider. The findings of fact by the court below are conclusive, and cannot be re-examined here. The Abbotsford, 98 U. S. 440 [25: 168], and cases there cited. Upon the facts as found there can be no doubt of the correctness of the judgment. It is apparent if the case is kept here longer it will be for delay only. For that reason the motion to affirm is granted. Affirmed.

IRVING GRINNELL ET AL., Executors of MOSES GRINNELL, Deceased.

Review of order of circuit court remanding suit —repeal of law.

1. This court cannot review, on appeal or writ of error, the order of a circuit court remanding a suit made while the Act of March 3, 1875, chap. 137, 18 Stat. at L. 470, was in force, where the writ of error was not brought until after the Act of March 3, 1887, went into effect.

2. If a law conferring jurisdiction is repealed, without a reservation as to pending cases, all such cases fall with the law.

Submitted Nov. 21, 1887. Decided Dec. 12, 1887.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York. Dismissed.

The case is stated by the court.

Mr. Roger M. Sherman, plaintiff in error, in person:

It could not judicially appear, before any obligation rested on the defendant to present the record, that the suit did not really and substantially involve a dispute or controversy properly within the jurisdiction of the circuit court.

U. S. R. S. § 645; Act March 3, 1875, §§ 5, 6, 18 Stat. at L. 472; Bradstreet v. Thomas, 37 U. S. 12 Pet. 177 (9:1046); Gold W. & W. Co. v. Keyes, 96 U. S. 204 (24:659).

The withholding of the complaint cannot inure to the advantage of the plaintiffs below.

Act of 1875, § 7; Dennistoun v. Draper, 5 Blatchf. 336; Fisk v. Union Pac. R. R. Co. 6 Blatchf. 381; S. C. 8 Blatchf. 246; McBratney v. Usher, 1 Dill. 367.

The determination, in the absence of the complaint, would have been error for which this court would reverse.

U. S. v. Kirkpatrick, 22 U. S. 9 Wheat. 729 (6:201); Garland v. Davis, 45 U. S. 4 How. 131 (11: 907); Mandeville v. Burt, 33 U. S. 8 Pet. 256 (8:936).

An essential ingredient in the cause of action is the legal title of the plaintiffs. Public moneys cannot come to hand so as to be subject to a mere equitable title to the use of the principal.

2 Story, Eq. Jur. §§ 1042, 1045; U. S. R. S. § 3477.

It is presumable that such an award could occur only upon some mistake of fact.

Daniels v. Tearney, 102 U. S. 421 (26:189).

The money has been paid from the treasury contrary to law.

U. S. Const. § 9; Reeside v. Walker, 52 U. S. 11 How. 291 (13:701); Whiteside v. U. S. 93 U. S. 247 (23: 882); Knote v. U. S. 95 U. S. 154 (24:443); Steele v. U. S. 113 U. No estoppel could operate in favor of plaintiffs.

Messrs. Wm. M. Evarts, Joseph H. Choate & Charles Beaman and Treadwell Cleveland, for defendants in error.

This is a writ of error brought for the review of an order of a circuit court remanding a suit which had been removed from a state court. The suit was begun October 28, 1885; removed October 30, 1885, the state court making an order to that effect on that day; and remanded by the circuit court, May 4, 1886. All this was before the Act of March 3, 1887, chap. 373, 24 Stat. at L. 552, went into effect. The writ of error from this court was not sued out, however, until April 8, 1887, which was after that statute.

The first question which presents itself is whether we have jurisdiction of the writ. We have already decided, at the present term, in Morey v. Lockhart, 123 U. S. 56 [ante, 68] that this court cannot review, on appeal or writ of error, the order of a circuit court remanding a suit which had been removed under the Act of 1887, and which was begun, removed, and remanded after that Act went into effect. Later in the term we decided (Wilkinson v. Nebraska, 123 U. S. 286, ante, 152) that we had no jurisdiction when the suit was begun and removed before the Act of 1887, but not remanded until afterwards. In the last case we said that this statute showed "unmistakably an intention on the part of Congress to take away all appeals and writs of error to this court from orders thereafter made by circuit courts remanding suits which had been removed from a state court, and this whether the suit was begun and the removal had before or after the Act of 1887." That was as far as it was necessary to go in any suit that had come before us down to that time. Here, however, the question reaches one step further, and requires us to determine whether we can take jurisdiction on appeal or writ of error if the order to remand was made whilst the Act of March 3, 1875 (chap. 137, 18 Stat. at L. 470), was in force; but the writ of error was not brought until after that of March 3, 1887, went into effect, and we are of opinion that we cannot. This is the logical result of what has already been decided. Until the Act of 1875 there was no such jurisdiction. Chicago & A. R. R. Co. v. Wiswall, 90 U. S. 23 Wall. 507 [23: 103]. The provision of that Act giving the jurisdiction was repealed by the Act of 1887 without any reservation as to pending cases, the proviso in the repealing section having reference "only to the jurisdiction of the circuit court and the disposition of the suit on its merits." Wilkinson v. Nebraska, ubi supra. As a consequence of this the repeal operated to take away jurisdiction in cases where the order to remand had been made, but no appeal or writ of error taken, because "If a law conferring jurisdiction is repealed without a reservation as to pending cases, all such cases fall with the law." Baltimore & P. R. R. Co. v. Grant, 98 U. S. 398, 401 [25: 231, 232] and cases there cited.

It follows that we have no jurisdiction of this writ of error, and it is accordingly dismissed.

Decree reversed on stipulation.

Decree reversed in accordance with the stipulation of the parties, and the cause remanded with instructions to enter a decree in favor of the complainant, as agreed by the parties to the appeal, but without prejudice to the rights of the other parties to the suit.

Submitted Dec. 8, 1887. Decided Dec. 12, 1887.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of Iowa. Reversed.

The facts are stated by the court.

Messrs. Jayne & Hoffman and W. F. Brannan, for appellant.

No one appeared for appellee.

This is an appeal by the complainant below from the following part of the decree in the cause:

"It is further ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the said respondent, Sarah G. Davenport, pay to the complainant the sum of five hundred and sixteen and $\frac{77}{100}$ dollars, with interest at the rate of six per cent per annum from the 10th day of May, 1883, the same being the amount, with interest, which the undivided half of the south half of block fifty-nine (59) which descended to, and has become vested in, the said Sarah G. Davenport as the mother and an heir at law of the said George A. Davenport, deceased, is chargeable for and on account of taxes on said block fifty-nine (59), which were paid and discharged out of the money advanced by the said Equitable Trust Company on the 28th of June, 1875; and that on failure to pay the said sum within the time herein limited the said master sell, at public sale, so much of the said Sarah G. Davenport's undivided half of the south half of said block fifty-nine (59) as shall be necessary to pay the same.

"Such sale to be made at the same place and in the same manner, and in all respects as is herein prescribed for the sale of the property of the said George A. Davenport, and with like effect. It is further ordered, adjudged, and decreed that upon payment by the said Sarah G. Davenport of the said sum of five hundred and sixteen and $\frac{77}{100}$ dollars to the said complainant, complainant's bill be dismissed as to the undivided one-half of the south half of said block fifty-nine (59), which vested in, and to which the said Sarah G. has become entitled, as the mother and heir-at-law of the said George A. Davenport, deceased. And it is further ordered, adjudged, and decreed that, as between the complainant and the said Sarah G. Davenport, the said Sarah G. Davenport recover of complainant the costs of this suit, so far as made, in trying the issue of the sanity of said George A. Davenport at the time of the making and delivery of said mortgage set up in complainant's original bill."

The only parties to the suit who are before this court are Henry R. Bond, trustee, complainant below and appellant, and Sarah G. Davenport. These parties have filed in this court the following stipulation:

"In the Supreme Court of the United States.

"Henry R. Bond, Trustee, Appellant, }
v. }
Sarah G. Davenport, Appellee. }

"Appeal from the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of Iowa.

"In the beforementioned suit it is stipulated by and between Henry R. Bond, trustee, complainant and appellant, The Equitable Trust Company of New London, Connecticut, the holder of the bonds secured by the mortgage sought to be enforced, and Sarah G. Davenport, appellee, being the sole parties in interest, as follows, to wit:

"1. Said Sarah G. Davenport hereby withdraws the answer and cross petition filed by her in said suit, and all evidence offered and introduced by her in said circuit court, and consents and agrees that the same shall not be considered as part of the record.

"2. It is agreed that a decree shall be entered by the supreme court in said suit, reversing the decision and decree of the said circuit court, in so far as said court found in favor of said Sarah G. Davenport, and in so far as said court by its decree denied to complainant the relief by him prayed, as against the undivided half of the south half of block fifty-nine (59), in the City of Davenport, Iowa, claimed by Sarah G. Davenport, as mother and heir at law of George A. Davenport, deceased, and in so far as said court, by its said decree, undertook to dismiss complainant's bill as against said property, and tax certain costs to complainant, and that this cause be remanded to said circuit court, with instructions to enter a decree in complainant's favor, declaring the sums owing upon said bonds, secured by said mortgage, to be a lien upon the premises in said mortgage, described as of the date of said mortgage, and directing sale of sufficient of said premises to pay the same, and further directing that the receiver heretofore appointed in said cause shall turn over to the complainant all the funds in his hands arising from the rentals of said premises, the same to be credited upon the amount found to be owing upon said bonds secured by said mortgage before sale of said premises, and further directing that the complainant be permitted to further plead and bring in new parties if so advised.

"3. The complainant and appellant is excused from printing the record in this suit, save and except such portions thereof as to him shall seem material to enable the court to dispose of said suit under this stipulation.

"4. The attorney or solicitor who has entered his appearance in this suit is authorized to consent to such demand or requirement of the complainant, or the said court, as shall enable the complainant to have the said decree of the circuit court reversed, said cause remanded, and a final decree entered in the circuit court in complainant's favor, and for that purpose is hereby authorized to appear in said circuit court to any pleading filed by the complainant.

"5. No personal judgment shall be entered against the said Sarah G. Davenport in said suit, or any costs taxed either against her or in her favor.

"November 16, 1887.

The appellant now moves that the foregoing part of the decree, from which the appeal was taken, be reversed in accordance with the stipulation of the parties, and that the cause be remanded with instructions to enter a decree in favor of the complainant as agreed.

This motion is granted and the decree reversed without costs; and the cause is remanded with instructions to proceed in accordance with the foregoing stipulation of the parties to this appeal, but without prejudice to the rights of the other parties to the suit.

Issues in equity case—trial of them by jury—exceptions—voluntary settlement by husband.

1. On the trial of an equity case, a jury may be called into the court, and issues submitted to it by the court; a previous order for the trial of the issues by jury is unnecessary.

2. The question as to what issues should be submitted to the jury is one for the discretion of the court.

3. Where the chancellor adopted the findings of the jury as being satisfactory to him upon the whole testimony in the case, it is not the practice of an appellate court to consider formal exceptions to rulings in the course of the trial of the issues before the jury.

4. In Georgia, a voluntary settlement may be made by one for the benefit of his wife and children, provided it is recorded in the office of the clerk of the superior court of the county of the residence of the husband, within three months after its execution; and such conveyance is valid against a subsequent mortgagee who had notice of it before the mortgage to him was executed.

Mr. Justice Blatchford delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a suit in equity, in the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of Georgia, originally brought as an action of ejectment, by the wife of William C. Riddle, four of their married daughters, an unmarried daughter, three sons, and two daughters of a deceased daughter, against J. Ben. Wilson, in the Superior Court of the County of Washington, in the State of Georgia, in August, 1881, to recover the possession of 1,500 acres of land, and the mesne profits thereof, alleged to be of the yearly value of $1,300, since the first of January, 1877.

The original petition, by which the suit was brought, alleged that in the year 1853 the said William C. Riddle, then being the owner of the 1,500 acres of land, conveyed the same, by deed of trust, to himself as trustee for the petitioners, and that, although the defendant was in possession of the land, setting up a claim of title adverse to the title of the trustee and of the petitioners, Riddle, in violation of his trust, refused to bring suit for the recovery of the land or to collect the rents and profits.

In March, 1882, J. Ben. Wilson appeared and disclaimed all title to the land in dispute, and averred that he had never received any of the rents or profits thereof. At the same time, Benjamin J. Wilson, his father, appeared and asked to be made a party to the suit, claiming to be the owner of the land in dispute, and was, by an order of the court, made a party defendant. He being an alien, and the petitioners being citizens of Georgia, the suit was removed by him into the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of Georgia, under the Act of March 3, 1875. After the removal of the cause, the original petition or declaration was amended by adding, as parties plaintiff, William C. Riddle and the husbands of the four married daughters. The circuit court then, by an order, placed the case on the equity docket, and directed that the plaintiffs reform their pleading, so as to present their cause of action in an equitable shape.

In December, 1882, all of the above named plaintiffs filed in the circuit court a bill in equity against Benjamin J. Wilson, making the following averments: On the 23d of April, 1853, William C. Riddle, in consideration of natural love and affection for his wife and children, conveyed to himself as trustee, for the use, benefit and advantage of his wife and their children, for and during the natural life of the wife, "and, on her decease, to such child or children, or representative of child or children, as she might leave in life," two tracts of land in the County of Washington, one of 1,000 acres, known as the Brantley Mill place, and the other of 500 acres, known as the Brown place, to be held for ever free from the debts, liabilities, and contracts of Riddle and all other persons. The trust deed was duly recorded, on the 26th of May, 1858, in the office of the clerk of the Superior Court of the County of Washington. Riddle, after the conveyance, held the lands as trustee for his wife and children only, and under the terms of the trust deed. In 1866 Riddle was engaged in planting operations, and, in order to raise money, applied to the firm of Wilkinson & Wilson, doing business in Savannah, of which the defendant was a member. That firm, in consideration of consignments of cotton to be sent to them by Riddle, advanced to him, on his own account and not for the trust estate, large sums of money. The defendant was obliged to raise the money so supplied on the credit of his firm, and to furnish to parties advancing the money to his firm, planters' notes and mortgages and other collateral security. On his request, Riddle gave a mortgage lien, for a large amount, upon lands owned by him in his own right, and in that mortgage included the lands embraced in the trust deed. Riddle, at the time he created such mortgage lien, notified the defendant that part of the lands was trust property; but the defendant replied that it did not matter, as he only wished to use the lien as collateral. The defendant took the lien with full notice that it included the trust estate, as well as the individual property of Riddle. In 1870, the first mortgage was canceled and a new mortgage lien was given to the defendant, at his request, which lien was taken by him with full notice that the trust estate was included in the lien. The defendant, with such knowledge, caused the lien to be foreclosed, and, in 1877, bid in all the lands covered by it, including the trust estate, and caused a deed of the lands to be made to him by the sheriff of the county, and took possession of the trust estate with full notice of the rights of the plaintiffs. An answer on oath is waived, and the prayer of the bill is for a decree for the restoration to the plaintiffs of the trust lands and the recovery of the mesne profits; that the defendant be adjudged to hold the lands only as trustee for the plaintiffs, and be required to convey them to Riddle, or some other person, as trustee, on the uses and trusts contained in the deed; that the mortgage lien and the deed to the defendant under the foreclosure be declared null and void as to the trust estate, and reformed or canceled, so as to remove the cloud upon the title of the plaintiffs; and for general relief.

The answer of the defendant to the bill, filed in February, 1883, raises an issue as to the making and recording of the deed of trust. It avers that, after the date of the deed, Riddle continued in possession of the land as before, claiming and using it, and paying taxes on it as owner, in his individual capacity and not as trustee. It admits that the firm of Wilkinson & Wilson furnished money and plantation supplies to Riddle, from 1866 to 1870, on consignments by him of cotton to that firm. It avers that, at the close of the transactions, Riddle owed the firm over $80,000; that he gave no notice of any trust; that he gave a mortgage, as security for such indebtedness, covering his entire plantation and embracing the lands in controversy, with others; that he did not, before or at the time of the execution of the mortgage, notify the defendant that part of the lands was trust property; that he was then in possession of the premises, using them as his own; that the first mortgage was superseded by a second one, which was also taken without notice and under like circumstances of possession and use by Riddle; that money and supplies were advanced on the faith of the second mortgage; that, after its foreclosure, the whole mortgaged premises, except 3,000 acres, were sold at sheriff's sale under the morgage fi. fa., and the defendant became the purchaser; that at the sale no distinct notice was given of the trust claim or any particular claim, nor was any specific portion of the premises sold designated as the subject of an adverse title; that something was said to the effect that whoever bought would have trouble, but the warning, such as it was, applied alike to all the premises sold, and there was nothing to restrict it to the land in controversy or any other definite part; that the defendant heard nothing then about any trust; that the 3,000 acres not sold had been claimed, in the mode applicable to claims under the laws of Georgia, by Mrs. Riddle, and so could not be sold at that time; that she suffered the property now in controversy to be sold, without interposing any claim to it, although it was embraced in the same levy with the 3,000 acres which she did claim; that it is not true that the defendant knew that the mortgage deed included any trust land when he caused the mortgage to be foreclosed, nor did he know that the lands now in controversy were trust lands when he purchased them at the sale and took the sheriff's deed for them, nor did he have notice of the alleged right of the plaintiffs when he took possession of his purchase, unless what was so said at the sale, as above set forth, amounted to such notice; and that, even if it did, the right of the defendant could not be affected by notice, as he and his firm were innocent mortgagees for value, and had no notice at the time they gave credit and took the security. In April, 1883, the answer was amended by averring that the trust deed was not executed, signed or delivered, nor even written, at the time it bears date, nor until within the last few years; that it is a much younger instrument than the mortgage under which the defendant claims title; and that it was fabricated and antedated, and not recorded, and could not have been recorded, at the time the certificate of record entered on it represents it to have been recorded.

Issue being joined, the proofs on both sides were taken by depositions, according to the usual practice in equity cases. In December, 1883, a jury trial was had. The record does not disclose any order of court for the trial of feigned issues, or of issues of fact, by a jury, but merely states that, on the 5th of December, 1883, a jury was empaneled to try certain issues of fact, and gives the names of the jurors, and states the appearance of the respective parties at the trial, and the result, as follows:

"To the first issue of fact submitted by the court, to wit, 'Is the deed of trust presented a true, valid, and authentic instrument executed at the time it purports to be?'

"We, the jury, find that the deed of trust presented is a true, valid, and authentic instrument executed at the time it purports to be."

"To the second issue of fact submitted by the court, to wit, 'Did the defendant, B. J. Wilson, have notice of the existence of this trust deed at or before the execution of mortgage by plaintiff to defendant, May 5, 1870, or before the sheriff's sale in 1876?'

"We, the jury, find that the defendant, B. J. Wilson, had notice of the existence of this trust deed at or before the execution of the mortgage by plaintiff to defendant, May 5, 1870, and before the sheriff's sale in 1876."

There are eight bills of exceptions found in the record. One of them sets forth an exception by the defendant to the submission to a jury of the issues of facts arising in the case; four of them contain exceptions by the defendant to the rejection of evidence; and three of them contain exceptions to instructions given to the jury.

On the 6th of December, 1888, the circuit court made a final decree, which contains no reference to the jury trial, but states that the cause came on to be heard and was argued by counsel, and that the court, upon the proof submitted, finds and decrees that the deed of trust "is a true, valid, and authentic instrument, executed at the time it purports to be;" and "that the defendant, B. J. Wilson, had notice of the existence of this trust deed at or before the execution of the mortgage by the complainant, William C. Riddle, to defendant, May 5, 1870, and before the sheriff's sale in 1876." These findings are in the exact language of the findings of the jury. The decree then proceeds to adjudge that the defendant acquired no valid title to the lands embraced in the trust deed by virtue of the sheriff's deed made to him in 1876; that the 1,500 acres of land embraced in the trust deed are the property of the wife of Riddle and her children and grandchildren, under the terms and provisions of the trust deed; that the decree, by its own force and effect, establishes in and confirms to Riddle, trustee, and his successors in the trust, his right and title to the land, with the appurtenances and the rents and profits, upon the uses and trusts set forth in the deed, with full right to the possession, use, and control of the same; that the defendant, by the first of January, 1884, do restore the possession, use, and control of the trust estate to Riddle, trustee, and his successors in the trust; that the mortgage lien created by Riddle, May 5, 1870, to the defendant, and the deed executed and delivered to the defendant by the sheriff of the County of Washington in 1876, are null, void, and of no effect, as to the land and appurtenances embraced in the trust deed; and that the plaintiffs are entitled to $3,166.50 for the rents and mesne profits of the land, from the period when the defendant first took possession and control of it to the date of the decree, to be recovered by Riddle, trustee, or his successors in trust; that process of execution for the recovery of the same issue against the property of the defendant; and that the plaintiffs recover from him the costs of the suit. From this decree the defendant has appealed to this court.

The defendant objects to the submission to the jury of the issues of fact, on the ground that the chancellor should have first made an order directing a trial by a jury, at law, on issues framed; that the verdict of the jury on such issues should have been duly certified to the chancellor; that, on the contrary, a jury was called into the court of chancery and issues were submitted to it by the chancellor; that the findings of the jury were not properly before the chancellor, and he should have given no weight to them; and that no weight should be given to them by this court.

But we are of opinion that there is no force in this objection. It appears by the record that the same judge before whom the jury trial was had, acted as chancellor in making the decree in the suit in equity; and that the proofs taken and relied upon on the hearing in the suit in equity were the same proofs which were before the jury on the trial of the issues of fact. Under these circumstances, a previous order for the trial by jury, and any certificate of the result, by the judge presiding on the trial, to himself as chancellor, were unnecessary, although it would have been more formal if the court in equity had ordered a jury to be empaneled on the law side of the court, and the verdict had been certified by the clerk to the equity side, as was done in Kerr v. South Park Comrs. 117 U. S. 379 [29:924].

As to the objection to the submission to the jury of the issues passed upon by them, it is sufficient to say that the question of such submission was one for the discretion of the circuit court, and that it seems to have been not an unlawful exercise of such discretion to submit to the jury the particular issues upon which they passed.

The defendant assigns for error the rejections of evidence set forth in the bills of exceptions, and the instructions to the jury which were excepted to. No motion for a new trial was made in the circuit court. The submission of the issues to the jury was for the information of the conscience of the chancellor. It is evident from the terms of the decree that the chancellor adopted the findings of the jury as being satisfactory to him upon the whole testimony in the case, for the decree states that the court makes its finding "upon the proof submitted." Under such circumstances, it is not the practice of the appellate court to consider formal exceptions to rulings in the course of the trial of the issues before the jury. Brockett v. Brockett, 44 U. S. 8 How. 691 [11:786]; Johnson v. Harmon, 94 U. S. 371 [23:271]; Watt v. Starke, 101 U. S. 247 [25:826].

On the two issues submitted to the jury, we concur with the circuit court in its conclusions stated in the decree, which were in accordance with the findings of the jury, and in its other conclusions stated in the decree. We understand the finding of the decree to be that the defendant had actual, and not merely constructive, notice of the existence of the trust deed, at or before the execution of the mortgage to him in 1870, and before the sheriff's sale in 1876; and we concur in that finding. It is not necessary to discuss the evidence.

Nor do we consider it necessary to pass upon the question of the effect, as constructive notice to the defendant, of the recording of the trust deed in the office of the clerk of the superior court of Washington County, in May, 1853, in

The defendant had no dealings, as a creditor, with Riddle, until the fall of 1866; but nevertheless he contends that a voluntary deed of trust, such as that in the present case, was not good as against him, as a bona fide purchaser or mortgagee for value, even though he had actual notice of the voluntary deed at the time of the purchase or mortgage. We understand the law of Georgia to have been otherwise. A voluntary settlement such as was made in this case was authorized by the Statute Law of Georgia in force at the time, provided the conveyance was recorded in the office of the clerk of the superior court of the county of the residence of the husband, within three months after its execution. That was done in the present case, as the proof shows.

Section 1776 of the Code of Georgia, in force at the time the deed was made, provided that a husband might, at any time during coverture, either through trustees, or directly to his wife, convey any property, subject to the rights of prior purchasers or creditors without notice. Such a conveyance for the benefit of the children and grandchildren of the grantor, was also valid, if he was solvent, and if the provision was a proper one and free from fraud. Section 1778 of the Code, enacted in 1847, provided that every voluntary settlement made by the husband on the wife should be recorded in the office of the superior court of the county of the residence of the husband within three months after the execution thereof; and that, on failure to comply with this provision, such settlement should not be of any force or effect against a purchaser, or creditor, or surety, who, bona fide and without notice, might become such before the actual recording of the same. Section 2305 provides that a trust estate may be created for the use of some other person than the grantee; that no formal words are necessary to create such an estate; and that, whenever a manifest intention is exhibited that another person shall have the benefit of the property, the grantee shall be declared a trustee. Section 2632 provides that every voluntary deed shall be void as against subsequent bona fide purchasers for value without notice of such voluntary conveyance. It follows, from these provisions, that as the deed in this case was recorded in due time, it was valid as against the defendant, who had notice of it before the mortgage to him of May, 1870, was executed, and before the sheriff's sale in 1876. This result is in accordance with the decisions of the Supreme Court of Georgia. The decree of the Circuit Court is affirmed.

ALBANY STOVE COMPANY.

1. The patent granted to Lewis Rathbone and William Hailes, Nov. 21, 1865, for an alleged improvement in coal stoves, was anticipated by prior patents.

2. A disclaimer cannot be used to change the character of the invention. A man cannot, by merely filing a paper, drawn up by his solicitor, make to himself a new patent, or one for a different invention from that which he had described in his specification; nor can the drawings be used on a disclaimer to change the patent.

3. Sections 4917, 4922, R. S., do not apply to different classes of cases; one section authorizes a disclaimer to be filed in certain cases; the other enables patentees to maintain suits in those cases, provided a disclaimer is filed without unreasonable delay.

Argued Nov. 23, 1887. Decided Dec. 12, 1887.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court for the Northern District of New York. Affirmed.

The facts and case are fully stated by the court.

Mr. Andrew J. Todd, for appellants:

Disclaimer has been properly filed.

Silsby v. Foote, 61 U. S. 20 How. 378 (22:953); Burdett v. Estey, 15 Blatchf. 347.

The time of unreasonable delay in filing a disclaimer begins when knowledge that claim is bad comes home to the patentee.

Singer v. Walmsley, 1 Fish. Pat. Cas. 558; O'Reilly v. Morse, 56 U. S. 15 How. 62 (14:616); Seymour v. McCormick, 60 U. S. 19 How. 96 (15: 557); McCormick v. Seymour, 3 Blatchf. 209; Potter v. Whitney, 3 Fish. Pat. Cas. 77; S. C. 1 Lowell, 87; Ralston v. Smith, 9 C. B. N. S. 147.

Earle v. Sawyer, 4 Mason, 1; Curt. Pat. § 262; Howes v. Nute, 4 Fish. Pat. Cas. 265, 266; Thomas v. Welch, 1 L. R. C. P. 202.

Mr. Esek Cowen, for respondent:

The patentee can only recover for an infringement of what he claims as new.

Lehigh Valley R. R. Co. v. Mellon, 104 U. S. 112 (26:689).

The following are cases in which the claim was for two or more distinct inventions:

Silsby v. Foote, 55 U. S. 14 How. 218 (14: 894); S. C. 61 U. S. 20 How. 378 (22: 953); McCormick v. Seymour, 3 Blatchf. 222; Tuck v. Bramhill, 6 Blatchf. 95; Taylor v. Archer, 8 Blatchf. 315; Schillenger v. Gunther, 17 Blatchf. 66.

Mr. Justice Bradley delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a suit on a patent, in which the court below decided adversely to the complainants. The patent sued on was granted to Lewis Rathbone and William Hailes, November 21, 1865. It was for an alleged improvement in coal stoves, of the class known as "cannon" or circular stoves, so called in consequence of their consisting of one cylinder or cannon, without flues or separate fire chambers. The patentees in their specification allege that such stoves have generally been constructed with a contracted outlet, and with provision for admitting air above the fire. This, they say, they desire to obviate, having found that a much more perfect combustion can be maintained by enlarging the outlet for the smoke, and admitting air through the sides of a suspended firepot, at all points, and thus facilitating combustion by supplying oxygen to the burning coals beneath the surface of the firepot. Another object, they say, is to construct an open, circular firepot, which can be applied to or removed from the stove at pleasure, with a grate in its bottom, said grate being so applied that it can be moved for shaking the ashes from the firepot when desired.

They then proceed to describe their improved fire pot, referring to accompanying drawings. They say:

"The firepot is made of cast iron of a flaring form and of such diameter as to leave a free space, d, all around it when arranged within the stove. It extends from the enlarged fire chamber C down into the ash chamber B, and it is made with vertical openings through its sides for the admission of air into the body of coal within it.

"The bottom of this firepot is an open grate, G, which may be so applied that it can be moved around a central pin, e, or turned upon a horizontal bar, g; or both of these movements may be provided for.

"It will then be seen that the firepot and its grate are united together, so that both can be removed from the stove together.

"By thus connecting the grate and firepot together and arranging them within the stove, so that they are supported or suspended by means above mentioned, they can be removed very readily from the stove when it is necessary to renew them. .

"At the junction of the body of the stove with the ash pit section B is a ledge, h, extending entirely around the top of said section, as shown in figure 3. This ledge is perforated at regular intervals, and it is covered by means of a marble ring plate, i, which is also perforated in a manner corresponding to the perforations through the ledge. This ring plate, i, being provided with a knob or handle, it constitutes an annular register for regulating the admission of air into the section B of the stove below the point of suspension of the firepot, as indicated by the arrows in figure 2.

"The flanges b and c effectually close the upper portion of the space d surrounding the fire pot, so that no air can pass at this point; the air which enters the smoke chamber above the fire pot must either be admitted through the register J, in the feed door, or it must pass through the firepot.

"Our object is to maintain such an intense heat—in thefire pot, by the free supply of oxygen to the incandescent coal therein—all around this pot—that there will be little or no smoke formed after the fire is fully started. In this way we obtain a more perfect combustion, and are enabled to burn soft coal and obtain the greatest heating effects therefrom.

"Having thus described our invention, what we claim as new and desire to secure by letters patent, is—

"1st. Arranging a perforated firepot with a grate bottom within a circular stove having provision for the admission of air below the point of suspension of said firepot, substantially as described.

"2d. The combination of an annular horizontal register with a suspended firepot which has perforated sides, substantially as described."

The drawings and model exhibited at the hearing show that the firepot referred to in the patent was in the form of a basket, with grated bottom, and grated sides, for the admission of air, not only through the grated bottom, but through the sides. In the drawing the grated portion of the sides extends from the bottom nearly two thirds of the way upwards towards the top; but the specification speaks generally of vertical openings through the sides for the admission of air into the body of coal, without calling attention to or specifying any limitation to the extent of the openings, whether all the way, or only part of the way up the side of the firepot; and, as seen, the principal claim is for arranging a perforated firepot with a grate bottom within a circular stove, having provision for the admission of air below the point of suspension of said firepot.

Now it turns out that, before the issue of the patent sued on, there were already in existence two patents for a firepot of precisely the same description; one an English patent, granted to Robert Russell in July, 1857; and the other an American patent, granted to Zebulon Hunt on the 14th of June, 1864. The English patent shows two separate devices, one of a tapering firepot or basket having grated sides, but without a grate at the bottom. "Another modification consists in constructing the fire basket with perforated sides all around it by means of tubes." The patentee adds that "Solid bars may be used instead of tubes;" and again, "Instead of making the fire dishes to turn on a pivot as previously described, I sometimes hang them by a projection or flange formed upon the upper flange of a fire dish, which flange rests upon a corresponding projection on the inside of the casing." When the latter modification is used the inventor provides for a grated bottom to the fire dish in the following language: "The lower ring (f) may be formed in one piece with the bottom of the fire basket, and may be made solid or with apertures. . . . Apertures may be formed in the plate (j) to correspond to similar holes in the bottom of the fire basket so as to regulate the admission of air to the fuel."

The Russell stove, therefore, contains all the elements of the first claim of the complainants' patent, the perforated firepot with a grate bottom, suspended by a flange from the body of the stove, projecting into an ash pit or draft chamber, having provision for the admission of air below the point of suspension of the firepot.

It is true that the device of Russell is not placed in a circular, or "cannon" stove, consisting of a single cylinder, as defined in the patent of Rathbone & Hailes, the Russell stove being composed of two cylinders, one of which forms the coal magazine or reservoir. But we fail to see that any inventive power was required to apply the same firepot to a different kind of circular stove. That no invention was required seems to us too plain for argument. The patent of Zebulon Hunt shows a grated firepot of flaring form, suspended within the draft chamber of the stove, and provided with a grated bottom, the firepot suspended in precisely in the same manner as in the patent in suit, and the ash pit is provided with means for the admission of air below the point of suspension of the firepot. Hunt's stove was also a magazine stove.

We have no hesitation in holding that the supposed invention of Rathbone & Hailes, as described and claimed in their patent, was anticipated by the prior patents referred to.

Probably in anticipation or apprehension of this result, the complainants, after the commencement of this suit, on the 30th of October, 1882, filed in the Patent Office a disclaimer, which they suppose has the effect of narrowing their patent, and of obviating the objection of prior discovery. The substantive part of the disclaimer is as follows, to wit:

"Your petitioners, William Hailes, &c., represent that in the matter of certain improvements in coal stoves, for which letters patent of the United States, No. 51,085, were granted Lewis Rathbone and William Hailes on the 21st day of November, 1865, * * * they have reason to believe that through inadvertence, accident, or mistake, the specification and claims of said letters patent are too broad, including that of which said patentees were not the first inventors.

"Your petitioners, therefore, hereby enter their disclaimer to so much of the first claim as covers perforations or openings in the sides of a suspended firepot extending throughout the entire depth of sides, and limiting such perforations or openings to substantially the lower half of the firepot, the material or substantial part of the thing patented in and by said claim not hereby disclaimed being as follows:

"A firepot suspended from its upper edge with substantially the upper half of its sides made solid, and substantially the lower half of its sides containing perforations or openings."

Viewed as a disclaimer, this instrument naturally excites attention. A disclaimer is usually and properly employed for the surrender of a separate claim in a patent, or some other distinct and separable matter, which can be exscinded without mutilating or changing what is left standing. Perhaps it may be used to limit a claim to a particular class of objects, or even to change the form of a claim which is too broad in its terms; but certainly it cannot be used to change the character of the invention. And if it requires an amended specification or supplemental description to make an altered claim intelligible or relevant, whilst it may possibly present a case for a surrender and reissue, it is clearly not adapted to a disclaimer. A man cannot, by merely filing a paper drawn up by his solicitor, make to himself a new patent, or one for a different invention from that which he has described in his specification. That is what has been attempted in this case. There is no word, or hint, in the patent, that the invention claimed was a firepot with sides grated only half way, or part of the way from the bottom towards the top, or that such partially grated sides have any advantage over those grated all the way to the top. The first claim, as modified by the disclaimer, has nothing in the specification to stand upon, nothing to explain it, nothing to furnish a reason for it.

It is contended that the drawings annexed to the patent may be referred to for the purpose of defining the invention and showing what it really was. But the drawings cannot be used, even on an application for a reissue, much less on a disclaimer, to change the patent and make it embrace a different invention from that described in the specification. This is fully and clearly shown in the recent case of Parker & Whipple Co. v. Yale Clock Co. 123 U. S. 87 [31:100].

The counsel for the appellants suggests that there is a difference between sections 4917 and 4922 of the Revised Statutes (corresponding respectively to sections 7 and 9 of the Act of 1837,) and that the disclaimer filed in this case satisfies the conditions of the former of these sections. He says: "Evidently there are two sections under which a disclaimer can be made in this country: First, under section 4917, where the claim is too broad; that is to say, in the language of the section, where the patentee 'has claimed more than that of which he was the original and first inventor or discoverer; Second, under section 4922, where a patentee 'has in his specification claimed to be the original and first inventor or discoverer of any material or substantial part of the thing patented, of which he was not the original and first inventor or discoverer;' and it goes on to state that he 'may maintain a suit at law or in equity for the infringement of any part thereof which was bona fide his own, if it is a material and substantial part of the thing patented, and definitely distinguishable from the parts claimed without right.'"

We think that counsel is mistaken in supposing that these sections have reference to different sets of circumstances as grounds for a disclaimer. They both relate to the same condition of things in that regard, namely, to the case in which a patentee, through inadvertence, accident, or mistake, and without any fraudulent intent, has included and claimed more in his patent than he was entitled to, and where the part which is bona fide his own is clearly distinguishable from the part claimed without right. In every such case he is authorized by section 4917 to file a disclaimer of the part to which he is not entitled; and that is the only section which gives him this right. The object of the other section (4922) is to legalize and uphold suits brought on such patents as are mentioned in section 4917, to the extent that the patentees are entitled to claim the inventions therein patented; but no costs are allowed to the plaintiffs in such suits unless the proper disclaimer has been entered at the patent office before the commencement thereof; and no patentee is entitled to the benefits of this section if he has unreasonably neglected or delayed to enter a disclaimer.

We do not see how it is possible to misunderstand the two sections when read together, as it is necessary to read them. One section authorizes a disclaimer to be filed in certain cases; the other enables patentees to maintain suits in those cases, provided a disclaimer is filed without unreasonable delay. They are parts of one law, having one general purpose; and that purpose is to obviate the inconvenience and hardship of the common law, which made a patent wholly void if any part of the invention was wrongfully claimed by the patentee, and which made such a defect in a patent an effectual bar to a suit brought upon it.

There is no such difference in the phraseology of the two sections as to make them apply to different classes of cases. They refer to the same class, and, being read together, throw mutual light on each other. And viewed in that mutual light, we think it clear that there is no authority for amending a patent by means of a disclaimer in the manner in which the appellants have attempted to amend their patent in the present case.

The decree of the Circuit Court is affirmed.

NORTH PENNSYLVANIA RAILROAD COMPANY, Plff. in Err.,

v.

COMMERCIAL NATIONAL BANK OF CHICAGO.

Power to direct verdict—carrier's duty to deliver—direction on way bills—duty of last carrier in connecting lines—endorsement of shipping receipts—exception, effect of.

1. The circuit court has power to direct a verdict for the plaintiff upon the evidence, where it is clear that he is entitled to recover, and no matter affecting his claim is left in doubt to be determined by the jury.

2. The duty of a common carrier is not merely to carry safely the goods intrusted to him, but also to deliver them to the party designated by the terms of the shipment, or to his order, at the place of destination; and he incurs the same obligation so far as the delivery of animals, which he carries, is concerned; delivering them to one not entitled to receive them is a breach of duty, for which the carrier is accountable.

3. A direction on the receipts given on shipment and on the way bills, to "Notify J. & W. Blaker," does not qualify the duty of the carrier to deliver the animals to the order of the consignee.

4. The last carrier in connecting lines is bound to deliver the animals at the place of destination, and to the consignee there, or to his order, if he was made known to it on receiving the freight from the preceding connecting company. The custom of a company of delivering cattle without requiring the production of a bill of lading or the authority of the shipper, does not relieve the company from liability for cattle wrongly delivered by it.

5. The indorsement by the shipper to the plaintiff, the Commercial Bank of Chicago, of the receipts, taken on the shipment of the cattle, transferred the title, and gave to the Bank the right to their possession, and, if necessary, to sell them for the payment of the drafts taken by it against the shipment.

6. Under an exception taken by defendant, to the direction of the court upon the evidence to find a verdict for the plaintiff, the defendant may show, either that there was sufficient evidence to go to the jury, or that questions of law apparent upon the record would control the case in opposition to the directions.

Argued Nov. 22, 23, 1887. Decided Dec. 19, 1887.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Pennsylvania. Affirmed.

Statement of the case by Mr. Justice Field:

This was an action brought by the Commercial National Bank of Chicago against the North Pennsylvania Railroad Company, to recover the value of 404 head of cattle received by it in November, 1877, to transport to Philadelphia, and not delivered there to the plaintiff, the assignee of the shipper, or to its order. The facts out of which it arose are briefly as follows:

In 1877 one Paris Myrick was engaged at Chicago in the business of buying cattle and forwarding them by railway to Philadelphia. On the 7th of November of that year he bought 202 head of cattle, weighing 240,000 pounds, and on the same day delivered them to the Michigan Central Railroad Company at Chicago, to be transported to Philadelphia. That company is one of several railway carriers forming a continuous line from Chicago to Philadelphia. On the delivery of the cattle, Myrick took from the company the following receipt:

"Michigan Central Railroad Company,
Chicago Station, Nov. 7th, 1877.

Received from Paris Myrick in apparent good order. Consigned to order Paris Myrick.

Notify J. & W. Blaker, Philadelphia, Pa.

Articles.	Marked.	Weight or measure.
Two hundred & two (202)	Cattle.	240,000

Advanced charges, $12.00.

Marked and described as above (contents and value otherwise unknown), for transportation by the Michigan Central Railway Company to the warehouse at * * *

Notice.—See rules of transportation on the back hereof.

Use separate receipts for each consignment.

Wm. Grogan, Agent."

On the margin of the receipt was the following notice:

"This company will not hold itself responsible for the accuracy of these weights as between buyer and seller; the approximate weight having been ascertained by track scales, which is sufficiently accurate for freighting purposes, but may not be strictly correct as between buyer and seller.

This receipt cannot be exchanged for a through bill of lading."

On the same day Myrick drew and delivered to the Commercial National Bank of Chicago a draft, of which the following is a copy:

"$12,287.57. Chicago, Nov. 7th, 1877.

Pay to the order of George L. Otis, cashier, twelve thousand two hundred and eighty-seven $\frac{57}{100}$ dollars, value received, and charge the same to account of—

Paris Myrick.

To J. & W. Blaker, Newtown, Bucks Co., Pa."

As security for the payment of the draft, Myrick indorsed the receipt obtained from the railroad company, and delivered it with the draft to the Bank, which thereupon gave him the money.

On the 14th of November, Myrick purchased 202 more head of cattle, weighing 260,000 pounds, and on that day delivered them to the Michigan Central Railroad Company at Chicago, to be transported to Philadelphia, and received from the company a receipt similar to the one taken on the first shipment. On the same day he drew another draft and delivered it to the Commercial National Bank, of which the following is a copy:

"$12,448.12. Chicago, Nov. 14, 1877.

Pay to the order of Geo. L. Otis, cashier, twelve thousand four hundred & forty-eight $\frac{12}{100}$ dollars, value received, and charge same to account of— Paris Myrick.

To J. & W. Blaker, Newtown, Bucks Co., Pa."

For the payment of this draft, Myrick indorsed the receipt obtained from the railroad company, and delivered it with the draft to the Bank, which thereupon gave him the money. The cattle of both shipments were conveyed on the road of the Michigan Central Railroad Company to Detroit, and thence over the roads of other connecting companies to Philadelphia. The last two carriers were the Lehigh Valley Railroad Company and the North Pennsylvania Railroad Company, whose lines extended between Waverly, Tioga County, N. Y., and Philadelphia. The cattle of both shipments were carried over the roads of these companies from Waverly on their joint way-bills. The thirteen covering the first shipment were dated November 10, 1877, and twelve of them were alike except in the number of cattle carried under them. The following is a copy of one of them:

Way-bill of merchandise transported by L. V. R. R. and N. P. R. R., from Waverly to Phila'a, Nov. 10th, 1877.

Kind and number of car.	Consignee or owner's name.	Description of articles.	Weight. 1st class.	Weight. 2d class.	Weight. 3d class.	Weight. 4th class.	Weight. Class A.	Rate.	Prepaid.	Freight.	Expenses.	Consignor.
Erie, 30483.....	P. Myrick. Notify J. & W. Blaker.	18 cattle, rec....	20,000	....	....	....	....	15 75	..	31 50	21 86	Buffalo.

R., 10.98; L. V. & N. P., 15.75. Chicago thro', 58c.

In the thirteenth joint way-bill of the first shipment the words "Notify J. & W. Blaker" were omitted.

The joint way-bills covering the second shipment were dated November 17, 1877, but, like the thirteenth joint way-bill of the first shipment, they did not contain the words "Notify J. & W. Blaker" after the name of the consignee or owner. In other respects, except in the number of cattle carried, they were similar to those covering the first shipment.

The cattle of both shipments arrived in Philadelphia—the first on November 11, and the second on November 18—and were immediately delivered by the Pennsylvania Railroad Company to the North Philadelphia Drove Yard Company, which was formed for the business of receiving, taking care of, and delivering live stock to their owners or consignees. This company notified the Blakers of the arrival of the cattle, and delivered them to those parties. The Blakers were dealers in cattle, and had particular pens in the yard assigned to them. The cattle of both shipments were placed in these pens by the agent of the Railroad Company at the drove-yard station; and he then wrote on the thirteenth joint way-bill of the first shipment, and on all the joint way-bills of the last shipment from Waverly, under the name of the consignee or owner, these words: "Ac. J. & W. Blaker." On the day after they arrived and were placed in these pens, in each case, the Blakers sold the cattle and appropriated the proceeds. The cattle of both shipments were delivered by the Railroad Company to the drove-yard company without any direction to hold the cattle subject to the order of the consignee, who was also the owner and shipper, and the cattle were delivered to the Blakers without such order. It does not appear that any demand was made by the Railroad Company, or by the drove-yard company, for anything to show the right of those parties to receive the cattle.

The bank transmitted the drafts for collection, with the carriers' receipts attached, to its correspondent at Newtown, Pennsylvania. The Blakers were notified of the receipt of the drafts, but failed to accept them, and they were protested for nonacceptance, November 27, 1877. They disposed of the cattle before the arrival of the drafts and carriers' receipts, and soon afterwards failed, and the drafts were not paid.

It appeared in evidence that Myrick had previously made numerous shipments of cattle from Chicago to Philadelphia, and taken similar receipts from the Michigan Central Railroad Company; that these cattle had been received by the North Pennsylvania Railroad Company and delivered by it at Philadelphia to the drove-yard company; that it had been the practice of that Railroad Company to deliver the cattle to the drove-yard company, and of the latter company to deliver them to the Blakers without the production of the carrier's receipt or any bill of lading, or any order of the shipper for their delivery. It also appeared that there was no knowledge on the part of the Commercial Bank at Chicago, or of its correspondent at Newtown, of any such practice; that drafts of Myrick, cashed by that Bank, had accompanied previous shipments of cattle; that such drafts, upon notice to the Blakers of their receipt, had always been promptly paid, and that the bills of lading (the carriers' receipts in question) were not surrendered to the Blakers until such payment.

Upon these facts the Commercial National Bank originally recovered a verdict and judgment against the Michigan Central Railroad Company, the court below holding that the receipts of that company constituted contracts to carry the cattle from Chicago to Philadelphia, and deliver them there to the shipper or to his order; but the judgment was reversed by this court, on the ground that a through contract for their carriage was not established by those receipts, and that the question of whether or not there was such a contract for their carriage should have been submitted to the jury to determine from the circumstances of the case. Myrick v. Michigan Cent. R. R. Co. 107 U. S. 102 [27:325]. The present action was subsequently brought against the North Pennsylvania Railroad Company, the last of the series of railroad carriers in the line from Chicago to Philadelphia, for the nondelivery at Philadelphia of the cattle of both shipments to the order of the shipper, as designated in the receipts given to him at Chicago, and in the way-bills given at Waverly—that is, to his assignee, the plaintiff herein. Upon the evidence in the case, which developed the facts substantially as stated, the court directed a verdict for the plaintiff for the amount of its claim. A verdict was accordingly rendered for $84,271.41, which was the amount of the drafts with interest from their dates. The cattle sold in November, 1877, for a sum greater than the amount of both drafts.

Judgment being entered on the verdict, the case was brought to this court for review.

Messrs. Wm. Rotch Wister and Geo. P. Edmunds, for plaintiff in error:

The receipts issued to Myrick by the Michigan Central Railroad Company, were not bills of lading at common law, and when they were issued there was no statute in Illinois giving such receipts the effect of bills of lading.

Mr. Justice Field delivered the opinion of the court:

There is no doubt of the power of the circuit court to direct a verdict for the plaintiff upon the evidence presented in a cause, where it is clear that he is entitled to recover, and no matter affecting his claim is left in doubt to be determined by the jury. Such a direction is eminently proper, when it would be the duty of the court to set aside a different verdict, if one were rendered. It would be an idle proceeding to submit the evidence to the jury, when they could justly find only in one way. Anderson County Commissioners v. Beal, 113 U. S. 227, 241 [28: 966, 971].

Upon the evidence presented, and there was no conflict in it, the law was with the plaintiff. The duty of a common carrier is not merely to carry safely the goods entrusted to him, but also to deliver them to the party designated by the terms of the shipment, or to his order, at the place of destination. There are no conditions which would release him from this duty, except such as would also release him from the safe carriage of the goods. The undertaking of the carrier to transport goods necessarily includes the duty of delivering them. A railroad company, it is true, is not a carrier of live stock with the same responsibilities which attend it as a carrier of goods. The nature of the property, the inherent difficulties of its safe transportation, and the necessity of furnishing to the animals food and water, light and air, and protecting them from injuring each other, impose duties in many respects widely different from those devolving upon a mere carrier of goods. The most scrupulous care in the performance of his duties will not always secure the carrier from loss. But notwithstanding this difference in duties and responsibilities, the railroad company, when it undertakes generally to carry such freight, becomes subject, under similar conditions, to the same obligations, so far as the delivery of the animals which are safely transported is concerned, as in the case of goods. They are to be delivered at the place of destination to the party designated to receive them if he presents himself, or can with reasonable efforts be found, or to his order. No obligation of the carrier, whether the freight consists of goods or of live stock, is more strictly enforced. Forbes v. Boston & L. R. R. Co. 133 Mass. 154; McEntee v. New Jersey S. B. Co. 45 N. Y. 34.

If the consignee is absent from the place of destination, or cannot, after reasonable inquiries, be found, and no one appears to represent him, the carrier may place the goods in a warehouse or store, with a responsible person, to be kept on account of and at the expense of the owner. He cannot release himself from responsibility by abandoning the goods or turning them over to one not entitled to receive them. Fisk v. Newton, 1 Denio, 45. If the freight consist, as in this case, of live stock, the carrier will not, under the circumstances mentioned (that is, when the consignee is absent or cannot after reasonable inquiries be found, and no one appears to represent him) relieve himself from responsibility by turning the animals loose. He must place them in some suitable quarters where they can be properly fed and sheltered, under the charge of a competent person as his agent, or for account and at the expense of the owner. Turning them loose without a keeper or delivering them to one not entitled to receive them would equally constitute a breach of duty for which he could be held accountable. These principles are firmly established by the adjudged cases, and rest upon obvious grounds of justice. Angell, Carriers, § 291.

The Railroad Company, defendant below, should therefore have given necessary instructions to the drove-yard company, which was its agent for the custody and care of the cattle, respecting their delivery—that it should be made only upon the order of the consignee, who was also the owner and shipper. The joint way-bills given by the two companies at Waverly, equally with the original receipts given at Chicago, disclosed his name. Those joint way-bills were for the guidance of, and were used by, the conductors of both companies.

In the case of The Thames, 81 U. S. 14 Wall. 98 [20:804], it appeared that the purchaser of cotton at Savannah delivered it there to a vessel to be carried to New York, taking bills of lading, in which it was stated that the cotton was shipped by one Gilbert Van Pelt, and was to be delivered "unto order or to his or their assigns." Van Pelt was a member of a firm in New York, for which he purchased the cotton. Against the shipment he drew a draft on his firm, payable fifteen days after sight, and delivered it, with the bills of lading, to parties who obtained a discount of a draft from a bank in Atlanta. The draft and bills were at once forwarded to New York to an agent of the bank, to procure their acceptance by the firm. Before the draft became due the vessel arrived at New York and gave notice to the firm of the arrival of the cotton. That vessel had previously brought cotton in the same way for the firm, and the master of the vessel, knowing that the cotton was intended for the firm, and having no information from the bank's agent, or from any other source, of any other consignee or claimant, delivered to it the cotton, taking its receipt. When the draft became due, two weeks afterwards, and was not paid, the cotton was demanded of the owner of the vessel by the bank's agent. In the action which followed it was contended by the owner that the delivery was justified, and that the vessel had discharged its obligation; but this court held that, though the delivery had been made in ignorance of any outstanding claim to the cotton, it was, nevertheless, a breach of the contract of affreightment, and that the agent of the bank could libel the vessel, which was bound for the proper delivery of the property, for the loss sustained. And the court said: "By issuing bills of lading for the cotton, stipulating for a delivery to order, the ship became bound to deliver it to no one who had not the order of the shipper, and this obligation was disregarded instantly on the arrival of the ship. And it is no excuse for a delivery to the wrong persons that the indorsee of the bills of lading was unknown, if indeed he was, and that notice of the arrival of the cotton could not be given.

Diligent inquiry for the consignee, at least, was a duty, and no inquiry was made. Want of notice is excused when the consignee is unknown, or is absent, or cannot be found after diligent search. And if, after inquiry, the consignee or the indorsee of the bill of lading for delivery to order cannot be found, the duty of the carrier is to retain the goods until they are claimed, or to store them prudently for and on account of their owner. He may thus relieve himself from the carrier's responsibility. He has no right under any circumstances to deliver to a stranger."

The direction on the receipts given at Chicago, and on the way-bills of the first shipment from Waverly, to "notify J. & W. Blaker," in no respect qualified the duty of the carrier to deliver the animals to the order of the consignee. If they were consignees, the direction to notify them would be entirely unnecessary, because the duty of the carrier is to notify the consignee on the arrival of goods at their place of destination. In the case of Furman v. Union Pacific R. Co., recently decided by the Court of Appeals of New York, 9 Cent. Rep. 284 [106 N. Y. 579], it was held that placing in a bill of lading a direction to notify certain persons is a plain indication, in the absence of further directions, that they are not the consignees. The earlier case of Bank of Commerce v. Bissell, 72 N. Y. 615, is also in point on this subject. There the action was against the defendants as common carriers upon a bill of lading of a boat-load of wheat shipped at Buffalo for transportation to New York on account and order of the plaintiff. The bill of lading contained this direction: "Notify E. S. Brown, New York," and was given to the bank as security for a draft drawn by the shippers on Brown. With the draft annexed it was forwarded to New York, with an indorsement by the cashier of the bank that the wheat was subject to payment of the draft, and was to be delivered only on such payment. On the arrival of the wheat in New York it was delivered to Brown, and he became insolvent before the draft fell due. It was held that the defendants were not warranted by the bill of lading in delivering the wheat to Brown, and that the discount of the draft and its acceptance did not justify the delivery. It was also held that the fact that the plaintiff did not indorse over the bill of lading to anyone in New York authorizing him to receive the wheat, did not relieve the defendants from the duty of holding it as plaintiff's property or subject to its lien; that they could have given notice to Brown, "and if neither he nor anyone else came with authority to take delivery, they could and it was their duty to have put the wheat in store."

It follows from these views that the defendant, the North Pennsylvania Railroad Company, in allowing the cattle to go into the possession of the Blakers, through its agent, the drove-yard company, without the order of the consignee, who, as stated above, was also the owner and shipper, became responsible for their value to the Commercial National Bank, which held his orders indorsed on the receipts for the shipments. It is true that the original receipts only bound the Michigan Central Railroad Company to carry safely the animals on its own road and deliver them safely to the next connecting line to carry on the route beyond. Myrick v. Michigan Cent. R. R. Co. 107 U. S. 102 [27:325]. But the last carrier in the connecting lines was bound to deliver the animals at the place of destination, and to the consignee there, or to his order, if they were made known to it on receiving the freight from the preceding connecting company. In this case there is no question that the company had such knowledge when the cattle were received. The destination and the name of the consignee appear upon the way-bills given at Waverly. There were only two places at which the cattle were, on their way from Chicago, reshipped, that is, taken from the cars, and, after a short interval of rest, replaced. Waverly was one of these places, and when they were reshipped there these way-bills, with a designation of the destination and consignee of the cattle, were made out.

The indorsement by Myrick to the plaintiff, the Commercial Bank of Chicago, of the receipts, taken on the shipment of the cattle, transferred their title, and gave the Bank the right to their possession, and, if necessary, to sell them for the payment of the drafts. The fact that the Railroad Company at Philadelphia had been in the habit of delivering cattle, transported by it, to the Blakers through the drove-yard company, without requiring the production of any bill of lading or receipt of the carrier given to the shipper, or any authority of the shipper, in no respect relieved the company from liability for the cattle in this case. It was not shown that the shipper or the bank which took the draft against the shipment, or its correspondent at Newtown in Pennsylvania, had any knowledge of the practice; and, therefore, if any force can be given to such a practice in any case, it cannot be given in this case where the party sought to be affected had no knowledge of its existence. In Bank of Commerce v. Bissell, cited above, the defendants offered to prove a custom in New York to deliver property under bills of lading to the person who was to have notice of its arrival. The evidence was rejected and the Court of Appeals held that there was no error in its rejection, stating that if the custom were established it could not subvert a positive, unambiguous contract.

Numerous other assignments of error are presented for which a reversal of the judgment is asked, but the propositions of law embodied in them were not urged in the court below; and, therefore, the fact that the court did not rule upon them constitutes no ground for interference with the judgment. The one exception taken was to the direction of the court upon the evidence to find a verdict for the plaintiff for the amount claimed. To that direction the defendant excepted, and it is at liberty to show, either that there was sufficient evidence to go to the jury, or that the questions of law apparent upon the record would control the case in opposition to the direction. But this it has not done. As before stated, there was no conflict in the evidence, and the law upon it was clearly with the plaintiff.

The judgment is therefore affirmed.

Date of appeal—appeal bond—appearance, effect of.

1. An appeal takes date from its allowance in open court, and, to be kept in force, it should be docketed here before the end of the term to which it was made returnable.
2. The subsequent acceptance of an appeal bond, to perfect the appeal, by the district judge, cannot be considered as the allowance of a new appeal at that date, where that was after the term at which the decree was rendered, and no citation was ever issued or served.
3. The appearance of counsel for appellee at the present term, on the making of this motion, is not a waiver of the citation.

This suit was brought to foreclose a mortgage given to secure several alleged debts. On the second of April, 1884, the bill was dismissed on its merits as to the principal one of the debts and some others; but as to the rest, and as to matters contained in a cross bill of the defendants, the cause was referred to a master to find certain facts and state certain accounts. The complainant on the same day prayed an appeal to this court, which was allowed, but never docketed here.

On the 10th of October, 1885, the court, after overruling certain exceptions to the master's report, entered a second and last decree, which was against the complainant, for $14,084.77. At the end of that decree was the following:

"And the complainant prays an appeal from the foregoing decree, which appeal is by the court hereby allowed, and the penalty of the appeal bond, if the same is to operate as a supersedeas, is fixed at dollars, but if the same is not to operate as a superedeas, then the penalty of the appeal bond is fixed at dollars."

The next term of this court thereafter began October 12, 1885, and the appeal was not docketed here during that term.

On the 8th of February, 1886, there was filed in the office of the clerk of the circuit court, an order made by the district judge at his chambers, and after the term at which the decree was rendered, fixing the amount of the appeal bond at $20,000 if for supersedeas, and at $2,000 if for costs only. On the 8th of March the complainant filed a motion to modify the amount of the appeal bond. On the 8th of June, while this motion was pending, the complainant filed with the clerk of the circuit court an appeal bond dated March 1, 1886, in the penal sum of $25,000, which had been approved by the district judge as a supersedeas bond. On the second of October the motion to modify the amount of the appeal bond was overruled by the court, "On the ground that the case was then in the Supreme Court of the United States." The case was docketed in this court October 15, 1886. It does not appear that any citation has ever been signed or served.

This motion was made on the 8th of December, 1887, during the present term, to dismiss the case, "because each of said appeals became null and void when the return term of this court passed without a transcript of the record being filed in this court and being docketed herein."

The first appeal taken in open court on the second of April, 1884, became inoperative by reason of the failure to docket the same in this court before the end of October Term, 1884. Whether the decree from which that appeal was taken was a final decree, or interlocutory only, it is unnecessary now to consider. The appeal allowed in open court October 10, 1885, also became inoperative as it was not docketed here before the end of October Term, 1885, and this too whether the bond approved by the district judge after the term was accepted to perfect that appeal or not. If an appeal at all, it was of the date of its allowance in open court, and to be kept in force it should have reached here before the end of the term to which it was made returnable. Grigsby v. Purcell, 99 U. S. 505 [25:354] and cases there cited.

The acceptance of the bond by the district judge cannot be considered as the allowance of a new appeal at that date, because that was after the term at which the decree was rendered, and no citation was ever issued or served. Hewitt v. Filbert, 116 U. S. 142 [29:581]. The appearance of counsel for appellee at the present term on the making of this motion is not a waiver of the citation. It would have been different if there had been a general appearance at the last term, that being the term to which the appeal, if it had been properly taken, would have been returnable. U. S. v. Armejo, decided April 8, 1866, and reported in Book 18, U. S. L. ed. 247.*

The motion to dismiss is granted.

The FEMALE ORPHAN ASYLUM OF PORTLAND, ET AL.

Limitation of property by will—construction of—effect of death.

1. If property be limited, upon the death of one person, to another, by will, and the first donee happened to predecease the testator, the gift over will take effect notwithstanding the failure, by lapse, of the prior gift. And this applies whether the gift over of the legacy or share is to take effect on the death of the prior legatee generally or on the death under particular circumstances, and whether the legacy be immediate or in remainder.

2. Where a will, in its third clause, gave the testator's wife the income of all his estate, and in the fourth clause provided that if his sisters Ann Smith, and Eleonora Robison be living at the death of himself and his wife, they or the one that should then be living shall have the income of all his estate as long as they live, and at their death to be divided in three parts, one third part of the income to go to the Portland Female Orphan Asylum, one third of the income to the Widows' Wood Society, and one third of the income to the Home for Aged Women—held, that the limitations in the two subdivisions of the will are to be taken with each other as a complete disposition of the estate, giving to the widow an estate for life, with an estate over for life to Ann Smith and Eleonora Robison, contingent upon one or the other of them surviving the widow, with the ultimate remainder to the Orphan Asylum, the Widows' Wood Society and the Home for Aged Women.

3. Held, further, that Ann Smith and Eleonora Robison having both died before the testator, such deaths did not cause the bequests to the three charitable institutions, above named, never to take effect, nor give the wife the estate absolutely.

1 Jarm. Wills, 5th ed. 830.

Mr. Justice Matthews delivered the opinion of the court:

Robert I. Robison, formerly of Portland, in the State of Maine, died on the 18th day of June, 1878, at that time a citizen of the State of New York and resident of Brooklyn, leaving a last will and testament, which was subsequently admitted to probate in the Surrogate's Court of Kings County, New York, and duly recorded on December 27, 1878. Letters testamentary thereon were on the same day issued and granted to Jane S. Robison, his widow, who alone qualified as executrix. The testator at the time of his death was seised of real estate in the City of Portland, and also possessed of a considerable amount of personal property.

*Not elsewhere reported.

The following is a copy of the will:

"I, Robert I. Robison, of Portland, in the State of Maine, being in a sound disposing mind and memory, do make and publish this my last will and testament. And, first, my will is that my executors see that my body be buried in a decent and proper manner in the family vault in the Eastern Cemetery in the City of Portland aforesaid. Secondly, I will all my just debts be paid in full; and from the balance I will that with whatever property may be standing in my wife's, Jane S. Robison's, name, at the time of my death, that my executors make up said amount to the sum of eight thousand and five hundred dollars, it being the amount, or thereabouts, which she received from her father and mother's estate, it being my will that the principal shall be kept good to her and her heirs, but not the interest. This is to be in full for all claims she may have on my estate arising out of the use of her property. Thirdly, I further will that she may have the income of all my estate, she having the right to spend the same, but not to have it accumulate for her heirs. Fourthly, it is my will that if my sister, Ann Smith, wife of Jacob Smith, of Bath, in the State of Maine, and Eleonora Cummings Robison, wife of Thomas Weeks Robison, of Kingston, Canada West, be living at the death of myself and wife, Jane S. Robison aforesaid, that they or the one that may be then living shall have the income of all my estate as long as they may live, and at their death to be divided in three parts, one third part of the income to go to the Portland Female Orphan Asylum, one third of the income to the Widows' Wood Society, and one third of the income to the Home for Aged Indigent Women, all of the City of Portland and State of Maine. Lastly, I do nominate and appoint my wife, Jane S. Robison, and John Rand, Esq., to be my executors of this my last will and testament.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto subscribed my name and affixed my seal this thirty-first day of October, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and sixty-two.

"(S'd) Robert I. Robison. [L. S.]

Signed, sealed, and declared by the said Robert Ilsley Robison to be his last will and testament in the presence of us, who, at his request and in his presence, have subscribed our names as witnesses hereto.

Chas H. Adams,
B. F. Harris,
Jason Berry."

On December 29, 1881, the present bill in equity was filed by Jane S. Robison, as widow and executrix, for the purpose of obtaining a construction of the will, the defendants being charitable institutions named therein, and the only other parties in interest, Ann Smith and Eleonora Cummings Robison, the persons mentioned in the fourth item of the will, having both died before the testator.

It was contended on the part of the complainant that, in consequence of the lapse of the devise and legacy to Ann Smith and Eleonora Cummings Robison, the bequest to the defendants never took effect, and that consequently the complainant was entitled to the estate absolutely, by virtue of the devise to her—or, in the alternative, because the testator had died intestate as to that part of the estate mentioned in the fourth subdivision of the will. The decree of the circuit court, however, was: "That the complainant is entitled only to the income of the estate during her natural life, and that the fourth subdivision of the last will and testament of the testator is operative and valid, and was so at the time the will took effect, and that the defendant Corporations acquired by virtue thereof the right, from and after the death of the complainant, to the perpetual income of the said estate." To review that decree the present appeal has been brought.

It is now contended in argument on the part of the appellant: 1, that the language of the third subdivision of the will, considered by itself, is sufficient to give to her the real estate in fee and the personal estate absolutely; 2, that the bequest in the fourth subdivision of the will to Ann Smith and Eleonora Cummings Robison is contingent on one of them surviving both the testator and the complainant; and, as the event happened, never became vested, 3, that the bequest to the defendants is dependent upon the vesting of the bequest to Ann Smith and Eleonora Cummings Robison, being affected by the same contingency, namely; one of them surviving the testator and the complainant; and 4, that if the interest of the complainant under the third subdivision of the will must be limited to a life estate, as the bequests contained in the fourth subdivision have lapsed, or cannot take effect, the testator died intestate in respect to that portion of his estate.

In support of the proposition that the bequest to the defendants must fall with that to Ann Smith and Eleonora Cummings Robison, counsel for the appellant rely upon the rule laid down by Mr. Jarman in the following language: "When a contingent particular estate is followed by other limitations, a question frequently arises whether the contingency affects such estate only or extends to the whole series. The rule in these cases seems to be that if the ulterior limitations be immediately consecutive on the particular estate in unbroken continuity, and no intention or purpose is expressed with reference to that estate, in contradistinction to the others, the whole will be considered to hinge on the same contingency; and that, too, although the contingency relate personally to the object of the particular estate, and, therefore, appear not reasonably applied to the ulterior limitations. Thus, where an estate for life is made to depend on the contingency of the object of it being alive at the period when the preceding estates determine, limitations consecutive on that estate have been held to be contingent on the same event for want of something in the will to authorize a distinction between them." 1 Jarm. Wills, 5th Am. ed. by Bigelow, *831.

But the rule referred to is one of construction, merely, and intended only as a formula for the purpose of classifying cases in which the meaning is gathered from the language of the testator expressing such intention, and is not to be applied to instances in which it appears that the contingency is restricted to the immediate estate. The same author divides those instances into two other classes: "First. Where the words of contingency are referable to and evidently spring from an intention which the testator has expressed in regard to that estate by way of distinction from the others. Secondly. The contingency is restricted to the particular estate with which it stands associated where the ulterior limitations do not follow such contingent estate in one uninterrupted series in the nature of remainders, but assume the form of substantive independent gifts." Id. 831, 832.

Under the second of these classes is ranged the case of Boosey v Gardener, 5 De Gex, M. & G. 122. In that case the testator bequeathed to his two sisters the interest of his long annuities for their lives; and in case of one or both of their deaths before his he gave the whole interest in long annuities to his brother for life; at his death (that is, the death of the brother) the testator gave half of the capital to his niece A., his brother's daughter, to help to bring her up, till she attained the age of twenty-one, then to receive half the capital; likewise, the testator bequeathed to his nephew S., his brother's son, if not further family, his other half, in case of further family, to be divided between them, not dividing the half left to A. It was held by Turner, L. J., that the bequest to the niece and nephew was not contingent upon the death of the sisters in the testator's lifetime, although the preceding estate for life to the brother was.

But little aid, however, in such cases is to be derived from a resort to formal rules or a consideration of judicial determinations in other cases apparently similar. It is a question in each case of the reasonable interpretation of the words of the particular will, with the view of ascertaining through their meaning the testator's intention.

In applying this principle, the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, in the case of Metcalf v. Framingham Parish, 128 Mass. 370, 374, speaking by Gray, C. J., said: "The decision of this question doubtless depends upon the intention of the testator as manifested by the words that he has used, and an omission to express his intention cannot be supplied by conjecture; but if a reading of the whole will produces a conviction that the testator must necessarily have intended an interest to be given which is not bequeathed by express and formal words, the court must supply the defect by implication, and so mold the language of the testator as to carry into effect, so far as possible, the intention which it is of opinion that he has on the whole will sufficiently declared. Ferson v. Dodge, 23 Pick. 287; Towns v. Wentworth, 11 Moore P. C. 526; Abbott v. Middleton, 7 H. L. Cas. 68; Greenwood v. Greenwood L. R. 5 Ch. Div. 954."

Looking into the present will, therefore, for that purpose, we find it evident that the testator did not intend by the third subdivision of his will to give to his widow an interest in his estate beyond her life. This conclusion is not based on any distinction between a bequest of the income of the estate and a bequest of the body of the estate itself; nor do we lay any stress on the declaration in that clause, "she having the right to spend the same, but not to have it accumulate for her heirs," although that language does afford an indication in support of the conclusion. But whatever force, standing by itself, the third subdivision might have, it is clear that the testator intended, in the event that his sister Ann Smith and Eleonora Cummings Robison should survive both himself and his wife, that they should have an estate for life, beginning at the death of his widow. That would necessarily limit the widow's estate to her own life. But as the estate given by the fourth clause to Ann Smith and Eleonora Cummings Robison for their lives was contingent on the event that one or the other of them should be living at the death of the wife, the question remains whether that contingency also entered into the bequest in remainder to the defendants. The fact that Ann Smith and Eleonora Cummings Robison died before the testator, whereby the legacy to them lapsed altogether, is not material, because if property be limited upon the death of one person to another, and the first donee happen to predecease the testator, the gift over would, of course, take effect, notwithstanding the failure, by lapse, of the prior gift. And this applies also whether the gift over of the legacy or share is to take effect on the death of the prior legatee generally or on the death under particular circumstances, and whether the legacy be immediate or in remainder. It was so held in Willing v. Baine, 3 P. Wms. 113, where the bequest was to A, but if he died under twenty-one, to B.

In Humberstone v. Stanton, 1 Ves. & Bea. 388, it was said: "It seems formerly to have been a question whether a bequest over, in case of the death of the legatee before a certain period, could take effect where he died during the testator's life, though before the period specified. In the case of Willing v. Baine legacies were given to children, payable at their respective ages of twenty-one; and if any of them died before that age, the legacy given to the person so dying to go to the survivors; one having died under twenty-one in the life of the testator, it was contended that his legacy lapsed, and did not go over to the survivors." The argument was that the bequest over could not take place, as "There can be no legacy unless the legatee survives the testator, the will not speaking until then; wherefore, this must only be intended where the legatee survives the testator, so that the legacy vests in him, and then he dies before his age of twenty-one. It was, however, held, and is now settled, that in such a case the bequest over takes place."

It follows, therefore, that unless it appear on the face of the will that the gift to the defendants was not intended to take effect unless the prior gift to Ann Smith and Eleonora Cummings Robison took effect, the former must be considered as taking effect in place of and as a substitute for the prior gift which, by reason of the contingency, has failed.

The scheme and intention, therefore, of the present will seems to us, considering the third and fourth subdivisions together, to be this: an estate for life to the testator's widow; an estate over for life to Ann Smith and Eleonora Cummings Robison, contingent on one of them surviving the widow, with the ultimate remainder in fee as to the real estate, and absolutely as to the personalty, in the defendants. The language of the contingency in the fourth clause, in our opinion, affects only the intermediate life estate of Ann Smith and Eleonora

Cummings Robison, it being, we think, the plain intention of the testator to give to his widow the estate in question only for her life, and not to die intestate as to any portion of the estate, and to limit the contingency only to the gift to Ann Smith and Eleonora Cummings Robison. It is true that the ultimate gift to the defendants is described as commencing "at their death," that is, at the death of Ann Smith and Eleonora Cummings Robison; but that language is evidently used only as indicating the expectation of the testator, which he would naturally indulge, that the beneficiaries named would live to receive the gift intended. Certainly those words are not to be construed so as to require that the gift to the defendants shall take effect at the death of Ann Smith and Eleonora Cummings Robison, irrespectively of the prior decease of the widow. The limitations in the two subdivisions of the will are to be taken in connection with each other as a complete disposition in the mind of the testator of his estate, giving to the widow an estate for life, with an estate over for life to Ann Smith and Eleonora Cummings Robison, contingent upon one or the other of them surviving the widow, with the ultimate remainder to the defendants.

The decree of the Circuit Court is, accordingly, affirmed.

NORTHERN PACIFIC RAILWAY COMPANY, Plff. in Err.,

v.

RICHARD MARES.

Injury to employee, liability for—question for jury—error in charge—preponderance of evidence—waiver of exception.

1. In an action against a railway company, by an employee, to recover damages for a personal injury occurring through the negligence of an engineer, held, that the evidence introduced that the engineer had, by his conduct, frequently shown his negligence, recklessness and unfitness for the place, and that, notwithstanding complaints made respecting him, he was retained by defendant, except during short intervals when he had been discharged two or three times for misconduct, together with the other evidence in the case, made a case for the plaintiff, unless overthrown by a successful defense.

2. Held, further, that the court was right in refusing to give peremptory instructions that if plaintiff knew, before his injury, of the unfitness of the engineer, it was plaintiff's duty to refuse to work with him any longer, and that his failure to do so would prevent his recovery. It was for the jury to say, from all the attending circumstances, whether the plaintiff's failure to do so was, in fact, contributory negligence.

3. It was not error for the court to charge the jury that the plaintiff had a right to suppose and assume that the Railroad Company had used proper diligence and care in the employment and retention of an engineer.

4. It was not error for the court to charge that the defendant, having alleged negligence on the part of the plaintiff, denominated contributory negligence, it must be established by preponderance of evidence to warrant the jury in finding it.

5. Where, upon the conclusion of plaintiff's case, counsel for defendant moved for a nonsuit, which the court denied and an exception was taken and defendant's counsel offered evidence in support of the defense, he thereby waived the exception.

Statement of the case by Mr. Justice Matthews:

This is an action at law brought by the defendant in error against the Northern Pacific Railroad Company, in the District Court of the Third Judicial District of the Territory of Dakota, to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been received by the plaintiff while in the employ of the defendant, by reason of its alleged negligence.

The complaint alleges that on October 31, 1881, the plaintiff was in the employ of the defendant as a brakeman, on duty as such in the yard at the City of Fargo, used for the purpose of switching cars to make up trains, in which service a switch engine was used; that at the time of the injury the engineer of the switch engine was one Bassett, who, it is alleged, was a man of hasty and excitable disposition and ungoverned, violent, and hasty temper, "And was and had for a long time been, while in the employ of this defendant as engineer, accustomed to become unduly and dangerously excited and angry, and while under the influence of anger or excitement, and while in the performance of his duty as engineer, was and had been accustomed to act and conduct himself as engineer in a most reckless manner, causing great danger and peril to his fellow servants, and especially to the brakemen on the train or cars attached to or moved by the engine on which he was engineer;" and that in consequence thereof "The said engineer was, at the time of the injury hereinafter referred to, and for a long time prior thereto had been, negligent, unskillful, unfit, and incompetent to act as engineer of said switch engine, or of any engine or locomotive; of which facts the defendant had notice and knowledge, and by the use of ordinary diligence defendant would have discovered and learned that he was a negligent and an unfit, unskillful and unsafe engineer. And this plaintiff had not notice or knowledge, prior to the injury to him hereinafter referred to, that the said engineer was for any reason or on any account an unfit or unsafe person to act as engineer."

It is further alleged that at the time of the injury the plaintiff "was required, in the performance of his duties as switch brakeman, to set or fasten or to loosen the brakes of the cars which were being switched or moved in the said yard, and he was at the time and place aforesaid required to perform the said duty on the cars of the defendant, which were being switched and moved by the engine in which the said Bassett was engineer, and in the moving of cars it was his duty as brakeman to give signals to the said engineer, and of the said engineer to obey such signals; that, at the time and place aforesaid, and while this plaintiff, in the performance of his duties as brakeman as aforesaid, was upon the top of the freight car (part of a train) being removed in the said yard by the engine in which the said Bassett was engineer, and while the said Bassett had control of and was managing said engine, this plaintiff, as it was his duty to do, gave the said engineer a signal to move and 'back' the cars attached to the said switch engine the length of a certain number of cars indicated by the signal. And the plaintiff, as he was in duty required to be, was standing on the top of the rear car so being moved backward; and before said cars had been moved backward the distance which they were intended to be removed, and the distance which the signal, given by this plaintiff, required them to be removed, the said engineer unskillfully, negligently, recklessly, and suddenly, and contrary to his duty, stopped and reversed the said switch engine and the cars attached thereto, and thereby threw the plaintiff off the rear car where he was standing, and where it was his duty to stand, to the ground; and thereupon the said engineer suddenly, negligently, recklessly, and violently and unskillfully, then and there, and before the plaintiff had time to or could move out of the reach of the cars or off the track, moved and pushed the said engine and cars backward upon said track and on to and over the plaintiff, and thereby greatly injured the plaintiff, and crushed and broke both of his legs, so that it then and there became and was necessary to amputate them, and they were then and there, on account of said injuries, amputated," etc.

The answer of the defendant alleged "That the said fall of the plaintiff and his said injuries resulting therefrom were solely caused, either by the negligence of the plaintiff himself, or by that of some one or more of the employés of the defendant engaged at work together with the plaintiff in the defendant's said yard at the time of the happening of the said injuries, and not by any negligence or fault on the part of the defendant."

The cause was tried by a jury, and resulted in a verdict and judgment for the plaintiff of $20,000 and costs. An appeal was taken from the district court to the supreme court of the Territory, where it was heard upon a record containing a statement on motion for a new trial, which it was stipulated might be treated as a bill of exceptions. It embodies all the evidence upon the trial, with the rulings of the court during its progress, and the charge of the court to the jury, with all the exceptions thereto noted. The judgment of the district court was affirmed. From that judgment the present writ of error is prosecuted.

Mr. James McNaught, for plaintiff in error:

Whart. Neg. § 214.

Mr. Justice Matthews delivered the opinion of the court:

It appears from the bill of exceptions that at the conclusion of the plaintiff's case counsel for the defendant moved for a nonsuit, which the court denied; and an exception was taken, which is still insisted on here. The defendant's counsel, however, offered evidence in support of the defense, and thereby waived this exception. Accident Ins. Co v. Crandal, 120 U. S. 527 [30:740]. When all the evidence had been submitted on both sides, the defendant by its counsel demurred to the evidence and moved the court to dismiss the action, which the court refused to do; and thereupon the defendant requested the court to direct the jury to find a verdict for the defendant, which request was refused, and an exception taken. The question raised by these rulings and the exceptions thereto is whether there was sufficient evidence to justify the court in submitting the cause to the jury.

There was certainly evidence tending to establish the following state of facts: that Bassett had been in the employ of the defendant as engineer in that yard before plaintiff was injured about a year; that during that time he had by his conduct frequently shown his negligence, recklessness, and unfitness for the place; that complaints had at different times been made of his negligent and reckless conduct to the defendant's representatives at Fargo; that, notwithstanding such complaints, he was retained in the same service, except during short intervals when he had been discharged two or three times for misconduct; that the plaintiff at the time of the injury had only been in the employ of the defendant about two weeks, and only about one week of that time with Bassett; that he worked as night brakeman; that on the night of the injury, and about fifteen or twenty minutes before the accident, the yard master called up the switching crew, who had been asleep for a short time, and ordered plaintiff to direct Bassett to move his engine so as to commence switching cars at the point named; that they were in haste to get ready for a train soon to come in from the East; that the plaintiff, as directed by the yard master, urged Bassett to move promptly, on account of which angry words passed between them; that thereafter, while under the direction of the yard master, they were backing some cars, and while he was standing on top of and near the rear end of the head car, which was the farthest from the engine, the plaintiff gave the signal to the engineer to back seven or eight car lengths; that it was the duty of the plaintiff to give such signals and of the engineer to obey them, and to continue backing until he was signaled to stop; that when he had backed about three car lengths he, without any warning to the plaintiff and without any reason or necessity therefor, very suddenly, recklessly, and negligently reversed his engine without shutting off the steam, giving the train so sudden and violent a jerk as to throw the plaintiff off and inflict the injuries complained of.

Clearly, this made a case for the plaintiff, unless overthrown by a successful defense.

It is claimed, however, by counsel for the defendant below, that there was evidence showing that the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence in two particulars: first, that he had knowledge of Bassett's incompetency, and ought, on that account, to have refused to serve with him; and, second, that he was standing too near the rear of the car without sufficiently guarding himself, by holding on or bracing himself against the effect of sudden changes of motion which were to be expected in the business of switching. But whether or not the plaintiff was in such fault as materially contributed to the injury in these particulars depended upon a consideration of all the circumstances of the case; and there was evidence sufficient to justify the jury in concluding, as they did, that the plaintiff was not guilty of negligence in these particulars.

At the request of the defendant the court gave to the jury the following instructions:

"In order to recover in this suit, the plaintiff must have established the following propositions, to wit: 1, that the plaintiff was hurt through the negligence or improper conduct of Arthur D. Bassett; 2, that the defendant neglected to use ordinary care in the selection of Bassett as the employé for running the switch engine mentioned in the evidence; 3, that the plaintiff was free from negligence on his part which contributed to the injury."

"If the jury believe that the plaintiff failed to use due care under all the circumstances in conducting himself while standing on top of the car referred to in the evidence, and that such want of care on his part contributed to produce his fall from the car, then the jury must find for the defendant."

"If the jury believe that the plaintiff failed to use due care, under all the circumstances, in conducting himself while standing on the car referred to in the evidence, and that such want of care on his part contributed to produce his fall from the car, in such case the jury must find for the defendant, although it is of opinion that Bassett was an unfit person to run the engine in question, and was guilty of actual negligence in running it on this occasion."

"In order to charge the defendant in this suit on the ground of Bassett having been an unfit man to run the engine in question, the unfitness must have been of a nature tending to make working with him and his engine unusually perilous."

The court also, among other things not excepted to, instructed the jury as follows:

"The employer is not liable for damages sustained by one employé caused by the negligence of another employé engaged in the same general business, unless the employer is guilty of negligence from which the injury resulted, and it is held that he who engages in the employment of another for the performance of specific duties and services for compensation, takes upon himself the natural and ordinary risks and perils incident to the performance of such services, and in legal contemplation the compensation is adjusted accordingly. These are perils which the servant is likely to know, and against which he can as effectually guard as the employer; they are perils incident to the services, and which can be as distinctly foreseen and provided for in the rate of compensation as any other." Also:

"The duties and liabilities of employer and employé to each other are defined by the Code or Statute of this Territory which must control this case, as follows: 'An employer is not bound to indemnify his employé for losses suffered by the latter in consequence of the ordinary risks of the business in which he is employed, or in consequence of the negligence of another person employed by the same employer in the same general business, unless he has neglected to use ordinary care in the selection of the culpable employé.'" And:

"But, gentlemen, if you find from the evidence that the defendant company was guilty of negligence in not providing a safe and fit man to run that engine, in consequence of which you also find the accident occurred, still, if the plaintiff failed to exercise that prudence, care and caution which a prudent man, under similar circumstances, ordinarily would exercise, which contributed to the injury, he is not entitled to recover."

The court also instructed the jury as follows:

"It is also true that if the plaintiff had full knowledge of the reckless and careless habits of the engineer Bassett, as complained of by him, or had reason to know of such recklessness and carelessness, he should either have quit the service or reported the facts to the officers of the Company having the power to discharge him, and a failure to do so might be negligence on his part; but, gentlemen, it is for you to say, from all the attending circumstances, whether he was neglectful in that regard.

"While this rule of law above stated is generally true, a reasonable view must be taken in its application here. The evidence tends to show that this plaintiff had been at work in this yard but a short time, and only a part of that time with or under this engineer Bassett. Now, had he such knowledge, or had he such an opportunity to know of the careless and reckless habits of Bassett that rendered it dangerous for him to work with him, and made it his duty to have refused to continue in such service, or have reported him to the officers of the Company?"

And also:

"The plaintiff must establish every material fact by a preponderance of evidence; and the defendant having alleged negligence on the part of the plaintiff, denominated contributory negligence, it must be established by a preponderance of evidence to warrant you in finding it; and upon this question you must decide."

The defendant requested the court to give the jury the following instruction:

"If the plaintiff knew, or had the opportunity of knowing, before his fall from the car in question, that Bassett was an unfit or unsafe man to run the engine in question, in that case it was the plaintiff's duty to refuse to work with him any longer, and his failure to do so would prevent him from recovering in this suit."

Which request to give said instruction the court refused, to which ruling the defendant duly excepted.

The defendant, by its counsel, thereupon requested the court to give to the jury the following instruction:

"The evidence adduced on behalf of the plaintiff tended to show that Bassett was guilty of negligence in running his engine during the same night on which the plaintiff was hurt, previous to the accident, and while the plaintiff was working with him. If the jury believe such to have been the fact, it must find for the defendant."

Which request to give said instruction the court refused, to which ruling the defendant, by its counsel, duly excepted.

At the plaintiff's request the court gave the jury the following instructions:

"This plaintiff, when he voluntarily entered into the employ of the defendant, took the risk of dangers ordinarily attending or incident to the business in which he was employed, including the perils arising from carelessness of his fellow servants."

To which the defendant, by its counsel, duly excepted.

The court thereupon, at the request of the plaintiff's counsel, instructed the jury as follows:

"But the above rule is subject to the following limitation or exception, viz: That the master or employer, whether a natural person or a corporate body, is legally bound to use due care not to expose the servant, when conducting the master's business, to perils or hazards against which he may be guarded by proper diligence upon the part of the master."

To this the defendant, by its counsel, duly excepted.

The court thereupon, at the request of the plaintiff's counsel, instructed the jury as follows:

"That in this case, while the defendant did not guaranty to its servants, or to this plaintiff, that the engineer on the switch engine in its yard at Fargo should be careful or skillful or competent, yet it was bound to exercise proper care to get a person in all respects fit for the place; and if after defendant had employed such engineer it learned, or had reason to believe that he was careless, reckless, or incompetent, it was its duty to discharge him.

To this the defendant duly excepted."

The court thereupon, at the request of the plaintiff's counsel, instructed the jury as follows:

"That if the defendant was careless, either in employing or retaining in its service a reckless, incompetent, or careless engineer on said engine, and on account of the recklessness, incompetence, or carelessness of such engineer the plaintiff was injured, without fault or negligence on his part, then, in such case, the Railroad Company is liable to him for the damage resulting from such injury."

To this the defendant duly excepted.

The court thereupon, at the request of the plaintiff's counsel, instructed the jury as follows:

"That sound sense and public policy require that railroad companies should not be exempt from liability to their employés for injuries resulting from the incompetency, negligence, or carelessness of co-employés, when, by the exercise of proper diligence, such injuries might be avoided."

To which the defendant, by its counsel, duly excepted.

The court thereupon, at the request of the plaintiff's counsel, instructed the jury as follows:

"That the plaintiff had a right to suppose and assume that the Railroad Company had used proper diligence and care in the employment and retention of an engineer."

The court thereupon, at the request of plaintiff's counsel, instructed the jury as follows:

"That what will amount to proper care and diligence in the selection of a servant for a particular duty or in the retention of such servant will in part depend on the character and responsibility of that duty which said servant is to perform. The greater the danger from the negligence, incompetence, or carelessness, the greater the care should be in his selection or retention; for instance, the same degree of diligence or care which is required in the employment of a locomotive engineer would not be required in the employment of a fireman."

To this the defendant duly excepted.

The court thereupon, at the request of plaintiff's counsel, instructed the jury as follows:

"If Bassett, the engineer in the yard at Fargo, was careless, reckless, or incompetent, and if such carelessness, incompetency, or recklessness caused the injury to the plaintiff, then if the agents or servants of this defendant, whose duty it was at that time to employ and discharge him if unfit, did not exercise due care in the employment of Bassett, or if after he was employed they in fact knew that he was careless, reckless, or incompetent, or if by the exercise of due care they would have discovered that he was careless, reckless, or incompetent, then the Railroad Company is liable to the plaintiff for any injury he may have suffered from such carelessness, recklessness, or incompentency of Bassett, if the plaintiff himself was not guilty of any negligence which contributed to that injury."

To this the defendant duly excepted.

The court thereupon, at the request of plaintiff's counsel, instructed the jury as follows:

"Ordinary care or due care in such cases is not merely such care as other railroad companies exercise under like circumstances, for other railroad companies may be careless. Ordinary care in the selection or retention of servants in such cases implies that degree of diligence and precaution which the exigencies of the particular service reasonably require—that is, such care as, in view of the consequences that may result from negligence on the part of employés, is fairly commensurate with the perils or dangers likely to be encountered."

To this the defendant, by its counsel, duly excepted.

The court thereupon, at the request of plaintiff's counsel, instructed the jury as follows:

"The jury have not legally a right to find that the plaintiff Mares was guilty of negligence which contributed to his injury unless the jury finds that that fact is shown by a proponderance of evidence."

And to this the defendant duly excepted.

We think the court was clearly right in refusing to give the peremptory instructions asked for by the defendant, that if the plaintiff knew or even had the opportunity of knowing, before his fall from the car in question, that Bassett was an unfit or unsafe man to run the engine in question, it was the plaintiff's duty absolutely to refuse to work with him any longer, and that his failure to do so would prevent him from recovering in this suit. The duty of the plaintiff under such circumstances is not to be determined by the single fact of his knowledge of the danger he incurred by continuing to serve with a coemployé known by him to be an unfit and incompetent person. It was enough for the court to say, as it did, that a failure on the part of the plaintiff to refuse to work, in view of that knowledge on his part, might be negligence on his part. The qualification was correct, that it was for the jury to say from all the attending circumstances whether his failure to do so was in fact contributory negligence. A suitable judgment on that question can only be reached by carefully weighing the probable consequences of both courses of conduct, and it might well happen that even at the risk of injury to himself, occasioned by the unskillfulness of his coemployé, the plaintiff might still reasonably be regarded as under a duty not suddenly and instantly to refuse to continue in the conduct of the business of his principal. Many cases might be conceived in which the latter course might even increase the danger to the plaintiff himself and entail great injury and loss to others.

Counsel for the plaintiff in error criticises the language of the court in its instruction to the jury, given at the request of the plaintiff's counsel, "that the plaintiff had a right to suppose and assume that the Railroad Company had used proper diligence and care in the employment and retention of an engineer," on the ground of vagueness and want of distinctness as to what diligence and care under the circumstances would be proper; but no explanation of the charge was asked for by the counsel for the defendant, nor was any exception taken to the instruction as given.

Objection is also taken to that portion of the charge which says: "And the defendant, having alleged negligence on the part of the plaintiff denominated contributory negligence, it must be established by preponderance of evidence to warrant you in finding it." The objection, as we understand it, is that it was calculated to mislead the jury by not only putting the burden of proof of the fact on the defendant, but also in assuming that they must look for that proof only to the testimony adduced by the defendant. We do not, however, think it possible that any jury could be misled in that way. The whole effect of the charge is that the fact in question must be established, from the whole testimony, by a preponderance of evidence in its favor. Where the burden of proof rested was immaterial at that stage of the cause when all the evidence was in; and the jury certainly could not suppose that they were confined, in their examination of that question, to the testimony adduced only on the part of the defendant.

On the whole case it abundantly and satisfactorily appears that the cause was submitted to the jury, upon the charge of the court, fairly, and with an accurate statement of the law applicable to the relation between the parties.

We find no error in the record; the judgment is, accordingly, affirmed.

A fund which is the result of the net earnings applied to or used for new purchases, or new construction, during the year 1871, is subject to the internal revenue tax of 2½ per cent, under section 15 of the Act of July 14, 1870, 16 Stat. at L. 260.

The single question in this case is whether a railroad company is liable, under the Act of July 14, 1870, chap. 255, § 15, 16 Stat. at L. 260, for a tax of 2½ per centum on its profits for 1871, not divided, but used for construction during that year.

The section referred to, so far as material, is as follows:

"That there shall be levied and collected for and during the year 1871 a tax of 2½ per centum * * on all undivided profits of any such corporation which have accrued and been earned and added to any surplus, contingent, or other fund."

The railroad company of which the Marquette, Houghton and Ontonagon Company is the successor, and for whose debts it is liable, earned, in 1871, $102,728.30, as profits, which were not divided, but were used during the year in the construction of new works and in creating new facilities for business. This amount was never in fact placed to the account of any particular fund, but it was taken from the money in the treasury to pay for the new structures and additions as they were made.

The Act of 1870 was entitled "An Act to Reduce Internal Taxes, and for Other Purposes." It is proper, therefore, to construe this particular provision in connection with the provisions of like character in the statutes imposing internal taxes which preceded that of 1870.

By the Act of July 1, 1862, chap. 119, 12 Stat. at L. 432, which was the first of the series of internal revenue statutes, with which that of 1870 was directly connected, railroad companies were required to pay a tax of 3 per centum on all payments of interest on their bonded debt, and on all dividends declared due or payable to stockholders "as part of the earnings, profits, or gains of said companies." Sec. 81, p. 469. And by section 82, p. 470, of the same Act, banks, trust companies, savings institutions and insurance companies were required to pay the same tax on all dividends "declared due, or paid to stockholders, to policy holders, or to depositors, as part of the earnings, profits, or gains of said * * * companies, and on all sums added to their surplus or contingent funds."

Following this was the Act of June 30, 1864, chap. 173, 13 Stat. at L. 223, which provided (§ 120, p. 283) for a tax of 5 per centum on the dividends of banks, trust companies, savings institutions, and insurance companies as in the Act of 1862, and "on all undistributed sums, or sums made or added during the year to their surplus or contingent funds." As to railroad companies, it was provided (§ 122, p. 284) that they should pay the same tax on the amount of the interest on their bonded debt, on dividends to stockholders "as part of the earnings, profits, income, or gains of such company, and on all profits of such company carried to the account of any fund, or used for construction." Secs. 120 and 122 were amended in some respects by the Act of July 13, 1866, chap. 184, 14 Stat. at L. 138; but these particular provisions were retained in substantially the same language.

That the tax here levied was not necessarily a tax on all the profits of these companies, but only on such as were used or disposed of in the ways specified, is shown by section 121 of the Act of 1864, 13 Stat. at L. 284, which provided that if any bank legally authorized to issue notes as circulation neglected to "make dividends or additions to its surplus or contingent fund as often as once in six months" the tax should be on "the amount of profits which have accrued or been earned or received by said bank during the six months next preceding the first days of January and July." And that profits "used for construction" were not looked upon as profits "carried to the account of any fund," or "added to any surplus or contingent or other fund," is evident from the fact that it was thought necessary when the taxes were increased in 1864 to make special mention of them as something more than had been already provided for, that is to say, in "profits carried to the account of any fund." When, therefore, profits "used for construction" were left out in the Act of 1870, it is evident to our minds that Congress intended to reduce the tax on railroad corporations to that extent. The question is not what would have been the meaning of "profits carried to the account of any fund," or "added to any surplus, contingent, or other fund," if this special provision in respect to profits "used for construction" had never been made, but what the meaning is with that provision left off after it had once been added. This is to be ascertained, not by inquiry into the manner of keeping railroad accounts, but by interpreting the language used by Congress at different times to give expression to its will; not by determing whether as matter of bookkeeping it is usual to carry undivided profits used for construction to a construction fund, but by studying the several statutes to see if it was intended that, if so used, they should be taxed under the Act of 1870. In our opinion it was not, and consequently the current earnings of the Company for the year 1871, used as earned in new construction, were not taxable as profits of that year.

The judgment of the Circuit Court is reversed, and the cause remanded with instructions to enter a judgment in favor of the Railroad Company on the facts found.

TEXAS AND PACIFIC RAILWAY COMPANY, Plff. in Err.,

v.

HENRY S. MARLOR.

Railway bonds—interest how payable—demand—election, when exercised.

1. Where bonds of a railway company contain a promise to pay interest, on a day certain in each year, and the further provision, that if the net earnings of the company in any year shall not be sufficient to enable the company to pay the interest, then scrip may, at the option of the company, be issued for the interest, held, that the option of the company to issue the scrip must be exercised at the time when, but for the insufficiency of the net earnings, it would be required to pay the interest in money; and that the scrip so issued should draw interest from the day on which the interest, which it takes the place of, was due.

2. Held, further, that in the absence of an exercise of the option, on the day the interest was due, to pay it in scrip, the bondholder had an immediate right of action for the interest money.

3. No demand by the bondholder was necessary to entitle him to the payment of the interest in money, on the failure of the company to exercise its option, on the day the interest fell due, to issue scrip therefor.

4. If the contract be that the promisor shall do one of two things by a certain day, at his election, he cannot exercise his election after the day has passed.

Mr. Justice Blatchford delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a writ of error to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York, brought by the Texas and Pacific Railway Company, a corporation organized and existing under Acts of the Congress of the United States, to review a judgment entered against it by that Court on the 17th of September, 1884, in favor of Henry S. Marlor, for the sum of $23,204.99.

The suit was commenced in a court of the State of New York, in November, 1883, and was removed into the circuit court by the defendant. It was tried by that court, on filing a written waiver of a jury, on an agreed statement of facts, and on the depositions of witnesses. The material facts of the case, as found by the circuit court, are as follows: Prior to the first of July, 1883, the plaintiff became the owner of 150 bonds issued by the defendant, and entitled to the interest due thereon on the first days of July in the years 1882 and 1883, according to the terms and conditions of the bonds. Each bond was in the following form:

"The United States of America.

No. —. $1,000.

The Texas and Pacific Railway Company.

Chartered by Act of Congress.

Seven Per Cent Income and Land Grant Bond on the Eastern Division.

"The Texas and Pacific Railway Company hereby acknowledges itself to be indebted to ——— ———, of —— ———, or assigns, in the sum of one thousand dollars, lawful money of the United States of America; which sum the said company promises to pay the said ——— ———, or assigns, at the office of the Company, in the city of New York, on the first day of January, A. D. (1915) one thousand nine hundred and fifteen, with interest thereon at the rate of seven per cent per annum, payable annually on the first day of July in each year, as provided in the mortgage hereinafter mentioned.

"This bond is one of a series of bonds numbered consecutively from one to eight thousand nine hundred and eight, of the denomination of one thousand dollars each, of like tenor and date, the payment whereof is secured by a first mortgage of even date herewith, duly recorded, upon certain lands heretofore granted to the Texas and Pacific Railway Company, by the State of Texas, or in which said Company is in any manner interested, being a first lien or charge upon all those sections or fractional sections or square miles of land acquired or to be acquired by said Company in constructing its lines of road east of Fort Worth, under or by virtue of the Acts of incorporation of the Southern Pacific Railroad Company, the Southern Transcontinental Railroad Company, the Memphis, El Paso and Pacific Railroad Company, or of the several supplements and enactments relating thereto, or under any of the special or general laws passed by the Legislature of the State of Texas, and applicable to said companies, or either of them, or to the Texas and Pacific Railway Company, the total quantity of land to be acquired in constructing said lines of railway under the several grants being estimated at or about 7,600,000 acres. This bond has also, as security for the interest, a mortgage lien upon the net income of the said Texas and Pacific Railway Company, derived from operating its lines of railway east of Fort Worth, in the State of Texas, after providing for the operating expenses, the current repairs and reconstructions, and the interest upon the first and second mortgage bonds secured upon said lines of railway, the length of which, constructed and to be constructed, is estimated to be 524 miles; and in case such net earnings shall not in any one year be sufficient to enable the Company to pay 7 per cent interest on the outstanding bonds, then scrip may, at the option of the Company, be issued for the interest, such scrip to be received at par and interest, the same as money, in payment for any of the Company's lands acquired as aforesaid in Texas, at the ordinary schedule price, or it may be converted into capital stock of the Company, when presented in amounts of $100 or its multiple. The holder of this bond is entitled to the benefit of the additional security of the sinking fund provided for in said mortgage, consisting of the net proceeds of the sales of the lands aforesaid, which are to be applied from time to time to the purchase of said bonds at their market value, not exceeding par, or to their redemption, as provided in the mortgage aforesaid. This bond will also be received by the Company at par and accrued interest, in payment or exchange for any of its lands covered by the mortgage aforesaid, at the current cash price of the same as fixed from time to time.

"In witness whereof, the said The Texas and Pacific Railway Company has caused these presents to be duly executed, sealed with its corporate seal, and attested by the proper signatures of its president or vice-president and secretary, this 15th day of May, A. D. 1875.

Frark Bond, Vice President.
Attest: C. E. Satterlee, Secretary."

Upon each bond was a certificate signed by the trustees in the mortgage mentioned in the bond, in the following form:

This bond is one of a series of bonds, each for the sum of one thousand dollars, lawful money of the United States of America, bearing 7 per cent interest per annum, payable yearly, said bonds being numbered consecutively from number one to number eight thousand nine hundred and eight. The said bonds are secured by a first mortgage upon all the lands of the Texas and Pacific Railway Company in the State of Texas, granted in aid of the construction of its lines east of Fort Worth, and also upon the net income of said lines of railway, after deducting current expenses, reconstruction and repairs, and the interest upon the first and second mortgages on said lines of railway; and they are also receivable, the same as money, in payment or exchange for such lands, at the current price of the same as fixed from time to time.

W. T. Walters,

The complaint alleged that the defendant did not exercise the option given to it by the bonds to pay the plaintiff the interest in scrip upon the 150 bonds, which became due and payable on July 1, 1882, or that which became due and payable on July 1, 1883, and demanded judgment for the interest in money, with accrued interest from those days, respectively.

There was no formal presentment by the plaintiff of the bonds in suit for the payment of interest on July 1, 1882, or on July 1, 1883, or at any other time. Shortly after each of those days, the treasurer of the defendant, at the defendant's office, notified the holders of the bonds, that it was not prepared to pay interest, as the earnings of the Railway were not sufficient; and no action was taken by it in reference to the issue of scrip. Before the commencement of this suit, and induced by the suggestion that suits were about to be brought to recover the interest on the bonds, and on or about October 12, 1883, the executive committee of the defendant's board of directors adopted a resolution providing for the payment of the interest in question in scrip. Notice of this action on the part of the defendant was given to the plaintiff and to the bondholders generally, by publication, before this suit was brought, and the defendant notified the plaintiff of its willingness to deliver to him his scrip for the interest in suit, and tendered it to him at the trial, but he refused to receive it.

On the 29th of March, 1875, the defendant had outstanding 9,252 land-grant bonds, secured by a first mortgage upon all the lands in the State of Texas which it had acquired, or might thereafter acquire, by virtue of its consolidation with the Southern Pacific Railroad Company and the Southern Transcontinental Railway Company, or by virtue of its consolidation with, or purchase of, any other railroad company in the State of Texas, under the authority of the Acts of Congress of March 3, 1871, and May 2, 1872; also, certain construction bonds, secured by a first mortgage upon its lines of railway and their appurtenances east of Fort Worth in the State of Texas. These land-grant bonds and construction bonds were fixed obligations, with coupons for semi-annual interest, and the mortgages which secured them contained provisions for foreclosure, in case of default in the payment of such interest. On the 29th of March, 1875, the road of the defendant was only partially completed to Fort Worth, about 325 miles of it being then built and in operation. The defendant had made default in paying the interest on the bonds above mentioned. On that day the stockholders met and passed the following resolution: "Resolved, That the board of directors shall be, and they are hereby, requested and fully authorized and empowered to provide for and to issue eighty-nine hundred and eight (8,908) income and land-grant bonds, each for the sum of one thousand dollars, bearing 7 per cent interest, the interest and the principal of said bonds to be payable in United States currency, and said bonds to mature in forty years from their date, and to secure the payment of the interest and the principal of said bonds by a first mortgage upon all the lands heretofore granted to this Company, or in which this Company in said State is in any manner interested, being a first lien or charge upon all those sections or parts of sections or square miles of land acquired by the Texas and Pacific Railroad Company, or to be acquired by said Company, in constructing its lines of road east of Fort Worth, under or by virtue of the Acts of incorporation of the Southern Pacific Railroad Company, the Southern Transcontinental Railway Company, the Memphis, El Paso and Pacific Railroad Company, or of the several supplements or amendments relating thereto, or under any of the special or general laws passed by the Legislature of the State of Texas, and applicable to said companies, or either of them, or to the Texas and Pacific Railway Company, the total quantity of land so to be acquired, in constructing said lines of railway, being estimated at about 7,600,000 acres; and said mortgage or deed of trust shall also include the net income of the Company from the operating of its lines east of Fort Worth, after providing for the operating ex penses, the current repairs and reconstructions, and the interest on the first and second mortgages hereinbefore provided for; and there shall be included in said mortgage or deed of trust a provision for a sinking fund out of the net proceeds of sales of land, and by the receiving of said bonds in payment for purchases of lands covered by the mortgage. The bonds thus provided for shall be exchangeable for outstanding land-grant bonds and used in purchase of material and supplies and for construction work, or may be applied toward the payment of any of the Company's indebtedness or obligations."

In pursuance of the authority thus conferred, the board of directors of the defendant issued 8,857 income and land-grant bonds, in the form of the one above set forth, and executed a mortgage to secure them, dated May 15, 1875, and a supplemental mortgage dated March 23, 1876, each to Walters and Krumbhaar, as trustees. The mortgage of May 15, 1875, recites the foregoing resolution, and sets out a form of the bond and of the certificate of the trustees, and then states that, in order to secure the payment of the principal and interest of the 8,908 bonds, according to the tenor thereof, the Company conveys to the trustees "all the lands heretofore granted to this Company, or in which this Company in the State of Texas is in any manner interested, being all those sections or parts of sections or square miles of land acquired by the Texas and Pacific Railway Company, or to be acquired by said Company, in constructing its lines of road east of Fort Worth, in the State of Texas, under or by virtue of the Acts of incorporation of the Southern Pacific Railroad Company, the Southern Transcontinental Railroad Company, the Memphis, El Paso and Pacific Railroad Company, or of the several supplements and amendments relating thereto, or under any of the special or general laws passed by the Legislature of the State of Texas, and applicable to said companies or either of them, or to the Texas and Pacific Railway Company, the total quantity of lands so to be acquired in constructing said lines of railway being estimated at about 7,600,000 acres of land; also all the net income of the lines of railway and appurtenances of the said The Texas and Pacific Railway Company east of Fort Worth, in the State of Texas, being 524 miles of railroad nearly completed, after deducting the expenses of operating and maintaining the same, and the interest and other resources due by reason of previous circumstances thereon, the same being the Texas and Pacific Railway Company's lines of railway, constructed and to be constructed, from the state line between Louisiana and Texas, westward, through Marshall and Dallas, to Fort Worth, in the State of Texas, and from Texarkana, on the state line between Texas and Arkansas, to a point of junction, via Clarksville, Paris, Bonham and Sherman, with the line aforesaid at or near Fort Worth, and from Marshall aforesaid, through the Town of Jefferson, to a point of junction, at or near Texarkana, with the said line from Texarkana to Fort Worth, together with all the depots, depot grounds, locomotives, rolling stock of every kind, and every appurtenance of every kind, real or personal, requisite or convenient for the use and operation of said lines of railway, including, also, all the net income arising from the leasehold interest of said Company in the line of railroad of the Vicksburg, Shreveport and Texas Railroad Company, extending from Shreveport, in the State of Louisiana, to a connection with the line of railroad of the Texas and Pacific Railway Company at the state line between Louisiana and Texas."

The mortgage further provided that no bonds should be issued until at least $2,254,000 of the outstanding land grant bonds theretofore issued should be deposited with the trustees and registered in their names, to be held as additional security for the bonds to be issued under the mortgage, until all the land grant bonds should have been so deposited or retired by the Company, and the mortgage under which they were issued satisfied of record, the holders of any outstanding land grant bonds to have the right, until January 1, 1876, to exchange their bonds, with accrued interest, at par, for the bonds issued under the new mortgage, the bonds so received in exchange to be registered and held by the trustees as additional security, as before provided, and, after January 1, 1876, the remainder of the bonds under the new mortgage to be disposed of as the board of directors might determine. The mortgage also provided for giving to the trustees lists and maps of the lands mortgaged, with minimum prices of sale, to be approved by both parties; and it contained sundry provisions for the sale of the lands, the purchase money to be received by the trustees, subject to the right of purchasers to pay for the lands with the bonds issued under the mortgage. Out of the proceeds of the sales of the lands, the expenses of the land department and compensation for the services and expenses of the trustees were to be paid, and the balance was to be appropriated to a sinking fund to redeem the bonds. Provision was made for applying the sinking fund yearly to purchasing the bonds at or less than par, or, if that could not be done, to redeeming bonds designated by lot; also, for the sale of the lands to pay the principal of the bonds, and for the termination of the trust on the payment in full of the bonds and interest. The supplemental mortgage of the 23d of March, 1876, conveyed to the trustees, subject to the trust created by the mortgage of May 15, 1875, "the lines of railway and appurtenances of the said Texas and Pacific Railway Company east of Fort Worth, in the State of Texas, being 524 miles of railroad nearly completed, after deducting the expenses of operating and maintaining the same, and the interest and other resources due by reason of previous circumstances thereon, the same being the Texas and Pacific Railway Company's lines of railway, constructed and to be constructed, from the state line between Louisiana and Texas, westward, through Marshall and Dallas, to Fort Worth, in the State of Texas, and from Texarkana, on the state line between Texas and Arkansas, to a point of junction, via Clarksville, Paris, Bonham, and Sherman, with the line aforesaid at or near Fort Worth, and from Marshall aforesaid, through the Town of Jefferson, to a point of junction, at or near Texarkana, with the said line from Texarkana to Fort Worth, together with all the depots, depot grounds, locomotives, rolling stock of every kind, and every appurtenance of every kind, real or personal, requisite or convenient for the use and operation of said lines of railway; including, also, all the net income arising from the leasehold interest of said Company in the line of railroad of the Vicksburg, Shreveport and Texas Railroad Company, extending from Shreveport, in the State of Louisiana, to a connection with the line of railroad of the Texas and Pacific Railway Company, at the state line between Louisiana and Texas, under and subject, nevertheless, to the lien and charge of prior incumbrances thereon, and subject to all the trusts, limitations, conditions, and provisions of every kind mentioned and set forth in the deed of trust dated May 15th, 1875, whereto this instrument of writing is supplementary."

Subsequently to January 1, 1876, as of which date the first installment of the income and land-grant bonds was issued, and in the years or interest periods ending respectively on the first days of July, 1877, 1878, and 1879, the net earnings of the Company, as defined in the bonds and mortgage, were insufficient to enable it to pay the interest on the bonds outstanding at those dates, and, throughout those years or interest periods, no interest was paid upon the bonds nor any scrip issued for the interest or any part of it. On the 16th of February, 1880, in pursuance of a resolution of the board of directors, the defendant issued scrip for the interest accumulated during the entire period included between the first of January, 1876, and the first of July, 1879. The net earnings of the road having been insufficient to enable the defendant to pay the interest on the bonds for the years ending July 1, 1880, and July 1, 1881, it issued scrip for the interest for those years, respectively. For the year ending July 1, 1882, there was a deficit of $195,076.17 in the earnings of the road; and for the year ending July 1, 1883, there were surplus earnings of $131,867.90; thus showing a net deficit, for the operations of those two years, of $63,208.27. The fact that the net earnings of those two years were insufficient to enable the defendant to pay the interest on the income and land-grant bonds as provided therein was promptly made known and declared by it to its bondholders, and the plaintiff had due notice thereof.

The income and land-grant bonds are registered obligations. Interest on them is payable only to registered holders or their assignees, by duly executed and acknowledged or authenticated order or assignment, at the office of the defendant, and upon the delivery by such holders, or such assignees, of receipts for the interest, or, in case scrip is issued, of receipts for the scrip. By uniform practice, from the first issue of scrip, the bonds, or such orders or assignments, are presented by the payee or registered holder, or such assignee, at the office of the defendant, for scrip. When scrip is delivered, no indorsement is made on the bond, but the receipt or voucher for the scrip is signed by the person receiving it, and the defendant cannot know to whom to issue or deliver scrip, or who is entitled thereto, or who will receive the same, until the bonds, or such assignments or orders, are presented at its office and scrip demanded, or unless the registered holder, properly identified, presents himself at the office of the defendant and demands the issue of the scrip. The plaintiff, in respect of the interest sued for in this suit, never presented the bonds and demanded the issue of the scrip for the years 1882 and 1883.

On the foregoing facts the circuit court found, as conclusions of law, that the defendant failed to exercise its option to pay the plaintiff the interest in scrip due on the first of July, 1882, and that due on the first of July, 1883, on the 150 bonds; and that the plaintiff was entitled to judgment for the two sums of $10,500 each, with interest on one from the first of July, 1882, and interest on the other from the first of July, 1883.

The opinion of the circuit court, which accompanies the record, and is reported in 22 Blatchford, 464, proceeded upon the view that there was nothing in the language of the mortgage which controlled or qualified the absolute promise in the bond to pay interest in money or in scrip; that the bond contained a promise to pay interest annually; that there was nothing in it to show that the owner was not to have his interest, or scrip instead, at the election of the defendant, if the net earnings of the Railway were not sufficient to pay the interest; that the plaintiff was entitled to his money, or the scrip as its substitute, on the day on which, by the terms of the bond, the defendant was to pay the interest or exercise the alternative; that there was no reservation, in terms or by implication, of a right in the defendant to exercise the option after the day of payment; that, that day having elapsed without an election by the defendant, the bondholder was entitled to be paid his interest in money; and that it was not incumbent on the plaintiff to present the bonds for the payment of interest on the day it fell due, or to then demand the payment of interest, as a prerequisite to his right of action to recover the interest money.

It is contended for the defendant that the bond in question is an income bond, in the sense that the interest on it is not payable in money on the first day of July in each year, unless net earnings, as defined in the bond and mortgage, have been made; that, if sufficient net earnings, as thus defined, have not been acquired during the year, then, unless the Company exercises its option to issue scrip, the interest accumulates until it is earned, or until it is paid out of the sinking fund created by the sale of the mortgaged lands, or until the bond with its accrued interest becomes due; that the effect of a failure to exercise the option on the interest day is not to create a present fixed obligation to pay the interest in money; that in any event the option to pay in scrip need not be exercised on or by the interest day, but it is sufficient if the scrip is ready for the bondholder when he demands it; and that the effect of any default to pay in scrip is not to make the defendant liable for the full amount of the interest, but only for the value of the scrip at the time of default.

We are of opinion, however, that the circuit court was correct in its construction of the contract between the parties. Much stress is laid by the defendant upon the fact that the bond, on its face, is called a 7 per cent income and land-grant bond; and from this the argument is deduced that the interest is payable only out of income. But, the expression income and land-grant bond is sufficiently justified and satisfied by the fact that the mortgage states that the principal and interest of the bonds is secured by a mortgage upon the land acquired or to be acquired by the Company, under the statutes specified in the mortgage, and upon the net income of the lines of its railway east of Fort Worth. The mortgage states that it is given to secure 8,908 income and land-grant bonds, each for $1,000, bearing 7 per cent interest, the interest and the principal of the bonds to be payable in United States currency, as distinguished from two other classes of bonds authorized at the same time, which were to be payable in gold coin. The resolution of the stockholders authorizing the issuing of the bonds was to the same effect. The option to pay the interest in scrip was not expressed in the resolution of the stockholders, but the mortgage states that the principal and interest of the bonds is to be paid "according to the tenor thereof." The bond contains a promise to pay the $1,000 on the first of January, 1915, in lawful money of the United States, "with interest thereon at the rate of 7 per cent per annum, payable annually on the first day of July in each year, as provided in the mortgage hereinafter mentioned." The words "as provided in the mortgage hereinafter mentioned" refer to the payment of the principal as well as the interest.

There is thus far an absolute obligation and promise to pay the interest on the first day of July in each year. How is that promise qualified subsequently in the bond? Only by the provision that, in case the net earnings derived from operating the lines of railway east of Fort Worth shall not in any one year be sufficient to enable the Company to pay 7 per cent interest on the outstanding bonds, then scrip may, at the option of the Company, be issued for the interest. The only alternative to the payment of the interest in money on the day named is that if the net earnings in the year shall not be sufficient to enable the Company to pay the interest on the outstanding bonds, it may elect to issue scrip for the interest; but the scrip is to be issued, if issued, as and for the unpaid interest; and it is plain that the option of the Company to issue the scrip must be exercised at the time when, but for the insufficiency of the net earnings, it would be required to pay the interest in money. If the option be thus exercised, reasonable time may be allowed to prepare the scrip and issue and deliver it; but as the scrip is to be received at par and interest, the same as money, in payment for the lands, or for conversion into the capital stock of the Company, it is necessarily to draw interest from the day on which the interest which it takes the place of was payable.

In the absence of an exercise of the option, on the day the interest was due, to pay it in scrip, the bondholder had an immediate right of action for the interest money. The security given by the mortgage upon the lands and upon the net income is entirely separate and apart from the obligation of the Company to pay the interest in money or in scrip. This last provision is one for the benefit of the Company, to enable it to retain in its treasury the net earnings derived from operating its lines east of Fort Worth, if such earnings do not amount in the year to enough to enable it to pay the full interest on the outstanding bonds; but, in such case, it must exercise its option, by the day the interest falls due, to give to its bondholders, for such interest, scrip for the full amount thereof. The contract cannot be construed so as to make it possible for the Company to retain all its net earnings, however little under 7 per cent on the amount of the outstanding bonds, and yet withhold from the bondholders the scrip, as the representative of the full interest promised to be paid. We do not, however, mean to suggest that the Company may not pay the net earnings in money for part of the interest, and pay the rest in scrip.

By the mortgage, all the net income from the lines east of Fort Worth was pledged to secure the payment of the principal and interest of the bonds "according to the tenor thereof;" and the bond states that it is secured by a mortgage lien upon such net income, "as security for the interest." The fact that the bond also states, on its face, that it will be received by the Company "at par and accrued interest," in payment or exchange for any lands covered by the mortgage, serves to confirm the construction above given. So, also, the certificate of the trustees on each bond states that the bonds bear 7 per cent interest per annum, payable yearly.

It is contended for the defendant, that it cannot ascertain by the interest day whether the net earnings for the year are sufficient to pay the interest in money, and that hence it cannot exercise its option, by the interest day, to pay the interest in scrip. It is a sufficient answer to this position to say that the contract it has made is that it will exercise the option by that day. Furthermore, it is found that the fact that the net earnings of the two years ending July 1, 1882, and July 1, 1883, were insufficient to enable the defendant to pay the interest, was promptly made known by it to the bondholders; and it is not found that it could not have sufficiently ascertained such fact by the interest day to enable it to exercise the reserved option.

It is urged for the defendant that, because it did not pay interest or issue scrip therefor, for the interest periods ending July 1, 1877, 1878 and 1879, but issued scrip in February, 1880, for the interest accumulated for the period between January 1, 1876, and July 1, 1879, a practical construction was put by the bondholders upon the contract, which cannot be regarded as merely a forbearance, or a waiver for the time being, of their rights under the contract. But it is also found as a fact, by the circuit court, that the net earnings of the road having been insufficient to enable the Company to pay the interest on the bonds for the years ending July 1, 1880, and July 1, 1881, it issued scrip for the interest for those years respectively. We see nothing, in all these facts, which amounts to a waiver which can affect or prejudice the right asserted by the present plaintiff in this suit.

We are also of opinion that no demand by the plaintiff was necessary, to entitle him to the payment of the interest in money, on the failure of the defendant to exercise its option, on the day the interest fell due, to issue scrip therefor. It is stated in the findings of the circuit court, that, shortly after the first of July, 1882, and shortly after the first of July, 1883, the treasurer of the defendant, at its office, notified the holders of its bonds that it was not prepared to pay the interest, as the earnings of the Railway were not sufficient; and no action was taken by it in reference to the issue of scrip. This shows that it did not on the proper days elect to issue scrip. The bond states that the scrip, if issued, is to be issued "for the interest," that is, in place of the interest, and, under the terms of the bond, the company was bound to pay the interest on the day it was due, or else to issue the scrip, on the failure of a sufficiency of net earnings to pay the full interest. There was, therefore, no obligation on the part of the bondholder to demand his interest in money, in order to perfect his right to recover it, in the absence of the exercise of an option by the Company, on the day the interest fell due, to pay it in scrip. He had no right, by the terms of the contract, to demand the scrip. It was for the Company to announce its election to pay in scrip, or, as it did, take no action in reference to the issue of scrip. In the absence of an election by the Company, on the day the interest fell due, to issue the scrip, the right of action of the plaintiff immediately came into existence, without any demand on his part, to recover the full amount of the interest mentioned in the bond.

The cases cited by the defendant on the question of damages do not apply to an alternative contract like that in the present case. It falls within those cases in which, if the contract be that the promisor shall do one of two things by a certain day, at his election, he cannot exercise his election after the day has passed. This is familiar law, and needs no citation of authorities.

The judgment of the Circuit Court is affirmed.

NORTHWESTERN MUTUAL LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY.

Tax deed, when barred—lien for taxes—effect of tax deed—multifariousness—decree as to tax title—effect of.

1. The title set up by the defendants in this action, under the deed executed by the county treasurer to Callanan in 1874, pursuant to a sale in 1871, for nonpayment of taxes assessed in 1870, is barred by the decree rendered for the plaintiff in 1877, upon a bill in equity to foreclose the mortgage dated Aug. 23, 1870, to which bill Callanan had been made a party, and upon which he had been defaulted.

2. By the Statutes of Iowa the State or the county has a lien on the land for the amount of the taxes from the time of their assessment; and upon the sale of the land for nonpayment of the taxes, the lien passes to the purchaser; but the title, subject to the lien, remains in the former owner until the execution of the tax deed; and if that deed is for any reason invalid the lien is the only interest in the land that the purchaser has.

3. If the tax deed is valid, it clothes the purchaser, from the time of its delivery, not only with the title of the person assessed for the taxes but with a new and complete title in the land, under an independent grant from the sovereign authority, which bars or extinguishes all prior titles and incumbrances of private persons, and all equities arising out of them.

4. Multifariousness as to subjects or parties, within the jurisdiction of a court of equity, cannot be taken advantage of by defendant, except by demurrer, plea or answer to the bill; it does not render a decree void, so that it can be treated as a nullity in a collateral action.

5. Where the whole title in the land was in the mortgagor, at the date of the mortgage, and the title under the tax deed, if valid, was subsequent in time, although paramount in right, to the title acquired under the mortgage and under the decree of foreclosure, it was within the jurisdiction and authority of the court, upon a bill in equity for the foreclosure of the mortgage, to determine the validity or invalidity of the tax title; and the owner of such title was a proper, if not a necessary, party to the bill.

6. A decree in such action, taken by confession, against the owner of the tax title, adjudging that he had no valid title nor lien, as against the plaintiff as mortgagee and as purchaser at the sale under the decree of foreclosure, is conclusive against the owner of the tax title, and cannot be collaterally impeached, but estops him and his grantees from setting up such title, in a subsequent action.

Argued Nov. 7, 8, 1887. Decided Dec. 19, 1887.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of Iowa. Affirmed.

Statement of the case by Mr. Justice Gray:

This was an action at law, in the nature of ejectment, to recover possession of a tract of land, brought on July 5, 1883, in the Circuit Court of the United States for the Northern District of Iowa, against Hefner and wife and Babcock and wife, by the Northwestern Mutual Life Insurance Company, stating its title in substance as follows:

On October 31, 1876, it filed a bill on the equity side of that court against Bates, Callanan and others, to foreclose a mortgage of the same, and other lands, executed to the plaintiff on August 23, 1870, by Bates, then the owner, containing the usual allegations of such a bill; also alleging that Callanan "claims some interest in and to a portion of the mortgaged premises, the exact nature of which your orator is unable to set out;" and praying that each and all of said defendants be made parties to the bill, and for a writ of subpena against all of them, and for judgment against Bates for the sums due on the mortgage, and for "a decree of foreclosure against the premises hereinbefore described against all of the before named defendants, and that the right, title and interest of each and every of the said defendants be by decree of this court forever barred and foreclosed, and that the master in chancery of this court be authorized to make sale of said premises, or sufficient thereof to satisfy the said several sums of money, with interest thereon, and the costs of this suit; and all and singular such relief as your orator is equitably entitled to receive."

Upon that bill, a writ of subpena was issued against and served upon all the defendants named therein, including Callanan.

On May 21, 1877, a final decree was entered in that suit, reciting a hearing of the plaintiff and of Bates, and a default of the other defendants, confirming that default, ascertaining the sums due on the mortgage, and adjudging that the mortgage "is a lien upon the mortgaged premises, prior and paramount to the lien of each and every of the said defendants;" that Bates pay those sums, with interest and costs, to the plaintiff on or before September 1, 1877; that, in default of such payment, a sale and conveyance of the mortgaged premises, or of so much thereof as might be necessary to satisfy those sums, be made by a master; "and that the right, title and equity of redemption of each and every of the defendants in this suit be, by a sale of the said mortgaged premises hereunder, forever barred and foreclosed, and the purchaser at such sale shall take the premises sold by title absolute, and such title shall relate back to the date of the execution of the mortgage to the complainant, to wit, the 23d day of August, 1870."

On October 5, 1877, pursuant to that decree, the master sold the mortgaged premises by auction, for less than those sums, to the plaintiff, and executed a deed thereof accordingly.

In the present action the plaintiff further alleged that the defendants, Hefner and others, were in actual possession, claiming a right acquired from Callanan since the beginning of the suit for foreclosure, and had no right to possession against the plaintiff, and that Callanan claimed some interest in the premises under and by virtue of a pretended tax deed.

The defendants filed an answer to this action, alleging that, the land in question being subject to taxes lawfully assessed thereon for 1870 and remaining due and unpaid, the county treasurer, at a tax sale on November 15, 1871, in conformity with law, sold the land to Callanan, and, there being no redemption from the sale, executed to Callanan on December 1, 1874, a tax deed thereof, which was duly recorded two days after, and a copy of which was annexed to the answer; and that the right and title created by the tax sale and deed, and no other, was owned by Callanan at the time of the proceedings for foreclosure and of the decree therein, and had since been conveyed by him to the defendants. A demurrer to this answer was sustained, and judgment rendered for the plaintiff; and the defendants sued out this writ of error.

Messrs. C. H. Gatch and Wm. Connor, for plaintiffs in error:

A tax title, under the provision of the Iowa Statutes, is not a derivative one but a new and independent title, derived from the sovereign power under which the tax is levied, paramount to all previous interests, and freed from all incumbrances.

Crum v. Cotting, 22 Iowa, 411.

A decree must be founded on and sustained by both the allegations and the proofs in the cause; and it cannot be based on a fact not put in issue by the pleadings.

In the foreclosure suit, the mortgagor's title was the only one which could be barred or foreclosed. The decree is necessarily limited in its effect to the parties who have some relation to the mortgagor's title, junior and subject to the lien of the complainant's mortgage.

In Peters v. Bowman, 98 U. S. 56 (25: 91), the court says that upon a bill of foreclosure, or, as in this case, a bill to enforce a lien for the purchase money, and when there has been no fraud and no eviction, actual or constructive, no one claiming an adverse title can be permitted to bring it forward and have it settled in that suit; such a bill would be multifarious and there would be a misjoinder of parties.

Mr. B. F. Kauffman, for defendant in error:

At the time of the execution of the mortgage the taxes in question had not been levied, and were, of course, no lien upon the property. The mortgage was the first and paramount lien; therefore whatever interest Callanan may have acquired, by virtue of the proceedings thereafter had, such interest was acquired subsequent to the execution of the mortgage to the company.

He became subrogated to the rights of the State and County as to the lien for taxes, if any, paid by him.

Mr. Justice Gray delivered the opinion of the court:

The question presented by the record is whether the title now set up by the defendants under the deed executed by the county treasurer to Callanan in 1874, pursuant to a sale in 1871 for nonpayment of taxes assessed in 1870, is barred by the decree rendered for the plaintiff in 1877, upon a bill in equity to foreclose a mortgage dated August 28, 1870, to which bill Callanan had been made a party, and upon which he had been defaulted.

By the Statutes of Iowa, taxes upon real estate are assessed to the owner in September of each year. In real estate mortgaged the mortgagor retains the legal title; and it is listed by and taxed to him, unless it is listed by the mortgagee. As between vendor and purchaser, the taxes become a lien on the land on the first day of November ensuing. If the owner neglects to pay them before the first day of the following February, they may be collected by distress and sale of his personal property, and also become a perpetual lien on the land against all persons except the United States and the State. The county treasurer may collect them by sale of the land, and if the owner does not redeem from that sale within three years, the treasurer executes a deed to the purchaser, which vests in him "all the title of the former owner, as well as of the State and county." Iowa R. S. 1860, §§ 710, 714, 734, 746, 756, 759, 763-784, 2217; Stats. May 27, 1861, chap. 24, § 2; April 7, 1872, chap. 110; Code of 1873, §§ 796, 803, 823, 839, 853, 857, 865, 871-897, 1938.

The effect of these statutes, as declared by the supreme court of the State, is that from the time of the assessment of the taxes the State or the county has a lien on the land for the amount thereof; that upon the sale of the land for nonpayment of the taxes that lien passes to the purchaser; but the title, subject to the lien, remains in the former owner until the execution of the tax deed; and that if that deed is for any reason invalid, the lien is the only interest that the purchaser has in the land. Williams v. Heath, 22 Iowa, 519; Eldridge v. Kuehl, 27 Iowa, 160; Everett v. Beebe, 37 Iowa, 452; Sexton v. Henderson, 45 Iowa, 160; Springer v. Bartle, 46 Iowa, 688.

But if the tax deed is valid, then from the time of its delivery it clothes the purchaser, not merely with the title of the person who had been assessed for the taxes and had neglected to pay them, but with a new and complete title in the land, under an independent grant from the sovereign authority, which bars or extinguishes all prior titles and incumbrances of private persons, and all equities arising out of them. Orum v. Cotting, 22 Iowa, 411; Turner v. Smith, 81 U. S. 14 Wall. 558 [20:724].

It is contended in behalf of the defendants that the only proper object of the suit to foreclose the mortgage was to sell the title of the mortgagor, and to cut off the equity of redemption of all persons claiming under him any title, lien or interest inferior or subject to the mortgage; and that the title under the tax deed, being adverse and paramount to the rights both of the mortgagor and of the mortgagee, could not be contested in that suit and was not barred by the decree therein. But the authorities cited fall short of supporting that contention.

Multifariousness as to subjects or parties, within the jurisdiction of a court of equity, cannot be taken advantage of by a defendant, except by demurrer, plea or answer to the bill, although the court in its discretion may take the objection at the hearing, or on appeal, and order the bill to be amended or dismissed. Oliver v. Piatt, 44 U. S. 3 How. 333, 412 [11: 622, 658]; Nelson v. Hill, 46 U. S. 5 How. 127, 132 [12:81, 83]. A fortiori it does not render a decree void, so that it can be treated as a nullity in a collateral action.

As a general rule, a court of equity, in a suit to foreclose a mortgage, will not undertake to determine the validity of a title prior to the mortgage and adverse to both mortgagor and mortgagee; because such a controversy is independent of the controversy between the mortgagor and the mortgagee as to the foreclosure or redemption of the mortgage, and to join the two controversies in one bill would make it multifarious.

Upon that ground it has been held by this court, as well as by the Courts of New York, California and Michigan, on appeals from decrees for foreclosure of mortgages, that the holders of a prior adverse title were not proper parties; and judges have sometimes used such strong expressions as that the mortgagee "cannot make them parties," or that their title "cannot be litigated," in a suit for foreclosure. Dial v. Reynolds, 96 U. S. 340 [24:644]; Peters v. Bowman, 98 U. S. 56, 60 [25:91, 92]; Eagle Fire Co. v. Lent, 1 Edw. Ch. 301; S. C. 6 Paige, 635; Banks v. Walker, 2 Sandf. Ch. 344; S. C. 3 Barb. Ch. 438; Corning v. Smith, 6 N. Y. 82; San Francisco v. Lawton, 18 Cal. 465; Summers v. Bromley, 28 Mich. 125.

But in none of the cases just cited was any question presented or adjudged of the effect that a decree of foreclosure, rendered in a suit in which such adverse claimants were made parties and their claims were directly put in issue and determined, might have against them in a subsequent action.

The cases of Strobe v. Downer, 13 Wis. 10, and Palmer v. Yager, 20 Wis. 91, were also appeals from decrees of foreclosure; and in a later case in Wisconsin the court summed up the law thus: "It is freely admitted that a foreclosure suit is not an appropriate proceeding in which to litigate the rights of a party claiming title to the mortgaged premises in hostility to the mortgagor; and that if such rights be so litigated, and be determined upon pleadings and proofs, the decree will be erroneous, and will be reversed. But whether, until reversed, such decree is coram non judice and void, so that it may be collaterally impeached, is quite another question. The conclusion would seem to follow, from all of the decisions, that it is not." Iowa County v. Mineral Point R. R. Co. 24 Wis. 93, 121.

There are indeed two cases in the Court of Appeals of New York, in which a common decree of foreclosure pro confesso was held to be no bar to a subsequent action at law by the owner of a title prior and paramount to the mortgage. But the decision in either case turned on the form in which the plaintiff at law had been made a defendant to the bill of foreclosure.

In the one case, a widow was held not to be barred of her dower by a decree of foreclosure, obtained after the death of her husband, of a mortgage executed by him alone during the coverture, on a bill against her and others as executors and devisees under his will, alleging that she and the other defendants "have or claim to have some interest in the aforesaid mortgaged premises, as subsequent purchasers, or incumbrancers, or otherwise, but what particular interest your orator is not informed," and praying that they might be foreclosed "of and from all equity of redemption and claim of, in and to' the mortgaged premises. The ground of the decision was that under the statutes and rules of court the allegations and decree were limited to rights subsequent and subject to the mortgage; and Judge Denio, in delivering judgment, said: "It is not intended to decide that if a party claiming a title prior to the mortgage should be made a party to the suit, and should answer and litigate the question, and should have a decree against him, it would not conclude him in a collateral action." Lewis v. Smith, 9 N. Y. 502, 516.

In the other case, a testator having devised land to his granddaughter in trust for his daughter for life, with remainder to the granddaughter in fee, the two afterwards executed a mortgage, the granddaughter not executing it as trustee, and having no power by law to execute it as such. The bill and decree of foreclosure were against them as individuals, and therefore the title of the granddaughter as trustee was held not to be barred by the decree, the court saying: "Her interest in remainder was subordinate to the prior estate for life in trust, created by the will; and she was not bound to set up her claim as trustee, when made a party to the foreclosure, in the absence of any averment in the complaint in respect to that interest, or claim that it was subject to the mortgage." Rathbone v. Hooney, 58 N. Y. 463, 467.

So in a recent case in California, not yet published in the official reports, in which a decree, upon a bill against husband and wife, foreclosing a mortgage, executed by the wife alone, of land held by them in community, was held not to bar a subsequent action of ejectment by the husband, the bill to foreclose contained no averment that the husband had or asserted any claim adverse to the title of the mortgagor, and the decree in terms only barred the equity of redemption. McComb v. Spangler [71 Cal. 418].

To a bill in equity to foreclose a second mortgage, although the first mortgagee is not a usual or necessary party when the decree sought and rendered is subject to his mortgage, yet, at least when he holds the legal title, and his debt is due and payable, he may—and, when the property is ordered to be sold free of all incumbrances, must—be made a party; and if he is, and the bill contains sufficient allegations, he is barred by the decree, the bill in such case being in effect both a bill to foreclose the second mortgage and a bill to redeem from the first mortgage. Finley v. Bank of U. S. 24 U. S. 11 Wheat. 304 [6: 480]; Hagan v. Walker, 55 U. S. 14 How. 29, 37 [14: 312, 316]; Jerome v. McCarter, 94 U. S. 734 [24: 136]; Miltenberger v. Logansport, C. & S. W. R. Co. 106 U. S. 286, 307 [27: 117, 125]; Woodworth v. Blair, 112 U. S. 8 [28: 615]; Haines v. Beach, 3 Johns. Ch. 459; Hudnit v. Nash, 16 N. J. Eq. 550.

In all the cases heretofore referred to, the adverse title was prior to the mortgage foreclosed. But in the case at bar, the tax title, though adverse to the mortgage title, was not prior to it. The whole title in the land was in the mortgagor at the date of the mortgage; and the title under the tax deed, if valid, was subsequent in time, although paramount in right, to the title acquired under the mortgage and the decree of foreclosure.

Upon the question whether the validity of a tax title subsequent in date to the mortgage may properly be litigated and determined in a suit for foreclosure, there has been a difference of opinion in the courts of the States. The Courts of California and of Michigan have held that it may. Kelsey v. Abbott, 13 Cal. 609; Horton v. Ingersoll, 18 Mich. 409; Wilkinson v. Green, 34 Mich. 221, 223. Those of Wisconsin and of Kansas have decided that it should not. Pelton v. Farmin, 18 Wis. 222; Roberts v. Wood, 38 Wis. 60; Short v. Nooner, 16 Kan. 220. But the question in each of these cases arose upon appeal from the decree of foreclosure; and there is no case, so far as we are informed, in which a decree upon apt allegations in a bill to foreclose a mortgage, adjudging a subsequent tax title to be invalid, has been allowed to be collaterally impeached by the holder of that title in a subsequent action.

Upon principle, it was within the jurisdiction and authority of the court, upon a bill in equity for the foreclosure of the plaintiff's mortgage, to determine the validity or invalidity of Callanan's tax title; and he was a proper, if not a necessary, party to such a bill.

If the mortgagor or the mortgagee had made a conveyance or assignment after the date of the mortgage, the purchaser or assignee would have been a necessary party to the bill to foreclose. Story, Eq. Pl. §§ 198, 199, 201; Terrell v. Allison, 88 U. S. 21 Wall. 289 [22: 634]. And in Stevenson v. Texas & P. R. Co. 105 U. S. 703 [26: 1215], the circuit court, and this court on appeal, upon a bill in equity to foreclose a mortgage, tried the validity of an adverse title under a sale on execution against the mortgagor upon judgments recovered since the mortgage was made, and adjudged that title to be valid, because the judgments were recovered before the mortgage was recorded.

At the date of the plaintiff's mortgage, the entire estate in the land was in the mortgagor, and was included in the mortgage. The subsequent assessment of the taxes created a lien upon that estate, which, upon the sale for nonpayment of the taxes, passed to Callanan; but the mortgagor, so long as his right of redemption from that sale existed, still held the legal title, subject first to the lien for taxes, and then to the mortgage. The deed afterwards executed by the county treasurer to Callanan, if valid, conveyed to him all the rights and interests, both of the mortgagor and of the mortgagee, and vested in him a complete title; so that the mortgagor had no title and no equity of redemption, and the mortgagee no lien and no right of foreclosure. There would seem to be no less reason for making Callanan a party to the bill than if he had claimed under a conveyance from or judgment against the mortgagor or the mortgagee since the date of the mortgage. But if Callanan was not a necessary party to the bill to foreclose the mortgage, clearly the mortgagor, if not the mortgagee, might have filed a bill in equity against him to redeem the land from the tax sale, alleging that he had a lien only, and not an absolute title; and by such a bill the issue whether he had or had not such a title would have been directly presented. The question whether that issue should be determined in the suit to foreclose the mortgage, or in a separate suit, was a question of multifariousness or of convenience, affecting the discretion only, and not the jurisdiction, of the court. By determining, before finally decreeing a foreclosure and sale, the question whether Callanan had a good title under the tax deed, the probability of obtaining a fair price at a sale under the decree of foreclosure would be increased, the rights of all the parties secured, and further litigation avoided. As was said by Lord Chancellor Talbot, and repeated by Chief Justice Marshall: "The court of equity in all cases delights to do complete justice, and not by halves." Knight v. Knight, 3 P. Wms. 331, 334; Corbet v. Johnson, 1 Brock. 77, 81.

In the absence of any statute or rule of court, restricting the natural meaning of the words, the allegation in the bill to foreclose, that Callanan "claims some interest in and to a portion of the mortgaged premises, the exact nature of which your orator is unable to set out," was sufficient to include Callanan's interest, whether it was a mere lien for the amount of the taxes, as it would have been if the right of redemption from the sale for taxes had not expired, or if the treasurer's deed was void for any reason, or was a perfect title in fee, as it would be if that right had expired and there was no defect in the tax deed. The prayer of the bill was, not only for a subpena and a decree of foreclosure against all the defendants named in the bill, but also that the right, title and interest of each and every of them be forever barred and foreclosed by the decree, and that a sale of the premises be made by a master and for further relief.

Callanan, by the service of the subpena, had due notice of the allegations and prayer of the bill. By the decree reciting and confirming his default, the bill was taken for confessed against him; and any final decree, warranted by the allegations of the bill, bound him to the same extent as if he had appeared in the suit, and demurred to or contested those allegations. Thomson v. Wooster, 114 U. S. 104, 111 [29:105, 107].

The decree not only adjudges, in the usual form, that the mortgage "is a lien upon the mortgaged premises, prior and paramount to the lien of each and every of the said defendants;" and that, in default of payment by the mortgagor of the sums found due on the mortgage, "the right, title and equity of redemption of each and every of the defendants in this suit be" by a sale under the decree "forever barred and foreclosed." But it further declares that "The purchaser at such sale shall take the premises sold by title absolute," and that "Such title shall relate back to the date of the execution of the mortgage," specifying that date.

That decree is a conclusive adjudication, which cannot be collaterally impeached by Callanan or those claiming under him, that he had no valid title or lien of any kind against the plaintiff as mortgagee of the land in question, and as purchaser at the sale under the decree of foreclosure; and was rightly held to estop the grantees of Callanan to set up his tax title in the present action.

F. P. TALKINGTON ET AL., Appts.,
v.
HENRY M. DUMBLETON.

Jurisdiction as to amount—affidavits, when proper.

In an action to set aside a deed of land, for false representations, where the value of the land was in issue in the court below, and the court found that it did not exceed $5,000, affidavits, showing that the value thus found was not the true value, are not admissible for the purpose of establishing the jurisdiction of this court; and where the court found such value to be not more than $5,000, held, that the appeal must be dismissed.

Submitted Dec. 15, 1887. Decided Dec. 19, 1887.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Oregon.

On motion to dismiss. Granted.

The action was brought to set aside a conveyance of land, made in exchange for other property, on the ground that the exchange was brought about by false representation of defendant as to the value of the property taken by plaintiff in exchange.

Plaintiff alleged that the value of the land was $7,000. Defendant alleged that it was only $4,000. The decree found that the value of the land was $5,000 and no more, and directed a reconveyance to plaintiff; defendant appealed to this court. Plaintiff now moves to dismiss because the value of the matter in dispute does not exceed $5,000. The defendant presented affidavits, showing that such value was sufficient for the jurisdiction of this court.

Mr. Frank V. Drake, for appellee, in support of the motion:

As to defendant there has not been, nor is there now, a controversy in amount or value exceeding $5,000.

The appeal as to Marx and Jorgensen should not be dismissed, provided the value of the land in dispute is of a sufficient amount to entitle the defendant Talkington to an appeal. This is not a motion to dismiss the appeal of Marx and Jorgensen, nor is it a motion to dismiss the appeal as to them. It is simply a motion to dismiss the appeal.

This suit was brought on the 10th of April, 1886, by Henry M. Dumbleton, the appellee, to set aside a conveyance of lands made by him to F. P. Talkington, one of the appellants, on the 23d of February, 1885, in exchange for the interest of Talkington in a saloon, on the ground that the exchange was brought about and the conveyance obtained by the false and fraudulent representations of Talkington as to the value of his property. In his bill Dumbleton alleged that the value of the land was $7,000, and that Talkington represented to him that the value of the property to be given in exchange therefor was of equal amount, or more.

In his answer, which was filed May 14, 1886, Talkington denied that the land, "or complainant's interest therein, was on February 15, 1884, or at any time since, has been of the value of $7,000, or of any greater value than $4,000," and he averred that at the time of the exchange "The said saloon, stock in trade, and the good-will thereof was of the value of at least $4,000." Upon the issue thus presented testimony was taken by both parties, that for Dumbleton tending to prove that the value was $7,000, and that for Talkington that it was less than $4,000. A decree was entered November 8, 1886, finding that the value of the land "was and still is $5,000, and no more," and directing Talkington to reconvey on the payment to him of the sum of $812.

From that decree Talkington and his codefendants, who claim under him, took this appeal, which Dumbleton moves to dismiss because the value of the matter in dispute does not exceed $5,000, that being the amount now required for our jurisdiction on appeals and writs of error from the supreme courts of the Territories in cases like this. 23 Stat. at L. 443, Act of March 3, 1885, chap. 355. To overcome the effect of the finding of the court upon the question of value, the appellants present here the affidavits of sundry persons, tending to show that the actual value of the land at the time of the decree was sufficient for our jurisdiction; and they ask that these affidavits may be considered upon this motion.

Inasmuch as the appellants sought in the court below to establish as part of their defense the fact that the land was not worth $7000, but only $4,000, and succeeded so far as to get the court to find that it did not exceed $5,000, we are not inclined to allow the same parties, for the purpose of establishing our jurisdiction, to show by affidavits that the answer of Talkington, the principal defendant, and sworn to by him, was erroneous in that particular, even if, under any circumstances, it would be permissible to show by affidavits that the value appearing in the record was not the true value, which we by no means admit. In Zeigler v. Hopkins, 117 U. S. 683, 689 [29: 1019, 1021], where affidavits were submitted, the finding of the court below as to value was not a material question in the case upon its merits, but was more in the nature of an inquiry for the purpose of determining whether an appeal should be allowed, as in Wilson v. Blair, 119 U. S. 387 [30: 441]. Here, however, the value of the property was one of the questions in the case and necessarily involved in its determination.

As the value of the matter in dispute is, according to the finding of the Court below, not more than $5,000, the motion to dismiss is granted.

ÆTNA LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY, Piff. in Err., v. ADA DAVEY.

Construction of policy—condition as to intemperance—use of alcoholic stimulants—question for jury.

1. In an action on a policy of life insurance, where the application contained the question, "Has the party ever been addicted to the excessive or intemperate use of any alcoholic stimulant or opium, or does he use any of them often or daily," and the answer was "No," held, that an instruction to the jury was correct, that they could not find the answer to be untrue unless the insured had, prior to the issuing of the policy, been addicted to excessive or intemperate use of alcoholic stimulants or opium or at the time of the application habitually used some of them often or daily.

2. Where the policy contained the condition that it should become null and void if the insured "shall become so far intemperate as to impair his health," an instruction to the jury, to the effect that such condition was not broken unless intemperance became the habit or rule of life of the insured after the policy was issued, was erroneous.

3. If the substantial cause of the death of the insured was an excessive use of alcoholic stimulants, not taken in good faith for medical purposes or under medical advice, his health was impaired by intemperance, within the meaning of the words, "so far intemperate as to impair his health," although he may not have had delirium tremens, and although, previously to his last illness, he had not indulged in strong drink for such a long period of time or so frequently as to become habitually intemperate. Whether death was so caused is a matter to be determined by the jury under all the evidence.

Action upon a policy of insurance. Plaintiff recovered judgment; defendant brought error.

The facts are further stated in the opinion.

Mr. Theron G. Strong, for plaintiff in error:

The physician's certificate of death furnished to the Company by the plaintiff below was evidence of the facts stated in it.

Statements in proofs of loss furnished by the insured, showing a violation of the policy, are not only evidence but amount to an estoppel.

The error was clearly prejudicial to the defendant below.

Deery v. Cray, 72 U. S. 5 Wall. 807 (18: 657); Smith v. Shoemaker, 84 U. S. 17 Wall. 630 (21: 717); Moores v. Citizens Nat. Bank, 104 U. S. 625 (26: 870); Gilmer v. Higley, 110 U. S. 50 (28: 63).

Individuals become so far intemperate as to impair health or induce delirium tremens, without having contracted the habit of, or being injuriously addicted to the use of alcoholic liquors.

Knickerbocker L. Ins. Co. v. Foley, 105 U. S. 350 (26: 1055).

The true test of the condition, so far intemperate as to impair his health, is whether or not there was an impairment of health; and if so, was intemperance in any degree the cause?

Odd Fellows Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Rohkopp, 94 Pa. 59; North Western L. Ins. Co. v. Muskegon Nat. Bank, 122 U. S. 501 (30: 1100).

Mr. John Linn, for defendant in error:

A party is always at liberty to contradict his own witness.

1 Whart. Ev. § 549; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 443.

The occasional use of intoxicating liquors did not render the insured a man of intemperate habits, nor would an exceptional case of excess justify the application of this character to him.

By its policy, issued July 16, 1878, the Ætna Life Insurance Company insured the life of William A. Davey in the sum of $10,000, payable to his wife, the present defendant in error, within ninety days after due notice and proof of the death of the insured, during the continuance of the policy. Among the questions in the application for the policy were the following: "5. Are the habits of the party sober and temperate? 6. Has the party ever been addicted to the excessive or intemperate use of any alcoholic stimulants or opium, or does he use any of them often or daily?" To the first question the answer was "Yes;" to the second, "No." The application, which by agreement was made the basis of the contract, contained a warranty of the truth of the answers to the above and other questions, and that the policy should be void if they were in any respect false or fraudulent.

The policy was issued and accepted upon the following among other conditions: 1, that the answers, statements, representations, and declarations contained in or indorsed upon the application, made part of the contract, are warranted to be true in all respects, and that the policy should be absolutely null and void if obtained by or through any fraud, misrepresentation, concealment, or false statement; 2, that if the insured "shall become so far intemperate as to impair his health or induce delirium tremens, or if his death shall result from injuries received while under the influence of alcoholic liquor," the policy should be null and void, except as provided in the eighth section of the conditions. The latter section is in these words: "In every case when the policy shall cease, be or become void (except by fraud, misrepresentation, concealment, or any false statement), if the premiums for three entire years shall have been paid, the amount which by the seventh section of these conditions would be applied to the purchase of a paid up policy shall not be forfeited to the said Company, but the same shall be due and payable in ninety days after due notice and proof of death of the said insured."

The insured died August 6, 1881, while on a visit at Alexandria Bay. The Company having received due notice and proof of his death, and having refused to pay the amount named in the policy, this action was brought by his widow. The Company, besides pleading the general issue, made these special defenses: that, contrary to the statements made in his application, the insured, for a long time prior to the issuing of the policy, was addicted to the excessive and intemperate use of alcoholic stimulants, and had used them often and daily; and that, in violation of one of the conditions of the contract, he became, after the issuing of the policy, so far intemperate as greatly to impair his health and to induce delirium tremens.

At the trial, evidence was introduced tending to establish both of these special defenses. But there was also evidence tending to show that the insured was not, prior to the issuing of the policy, addicted to the excessive or intemperate use of alcoholic stimulants, and that he did not, after that date, become so far intemperate as to impair his health or induce delirium tremens.

There was a verdict and judgment for the plaintiff for the sum named in the policy, with damages to the amount of $1,419.82.

Upon the issue as to the truth or falsity of the answer to the sixth question in the application for the policy, the court instructed the jury, in substance, that they could not find the answer to be untrue, unless the insured had, prior to the issuing of the policy, been addicted to the excessive or intemperate use of alcoholic stimulants or opium, or at the time of the application habitually used some of them often or daily. The charge, upon this point, followed almost the identical words of the question propounded to the insured, and is unobjectionable, unless, as is contended, the court erred in using the word "habitually;" implying thereby that the answer of "No" was a fair and true one, if the use by the insured of stimulants, at the time the policy was issued, was not so frequent or to such an extent as to indicate, in that respect, a fixed, settled course or habit of life. We are of opinion that the question put to the insured was properly interpreted by the court. The inquiry as to whether the insured had ever been addicted to the excessive or intemperate use of alcoholic stimulants, and whether at the time of the application he used alcoholic stimulants "often or daily" was, in effect, an inquiry as to his habit in that regard; not whether he used such stimulants or opium at all, but whether he used any of them habitually. If he was addicted to the excessive use of them, he was habitually intemperate; and to use them often or daily is, according to the ordinary acceptation of those words, to use them habitually. That this is the correct interpretation of the words is partly shown by the fifth question: "Are the habits of the party sober and temperate?"

But we are of opinion that the court below erred in its interpretation of the words in the policy which refer to the use of strong drinks by the insured after he obtained it. Having secured his agreement and warranty that he was not at that time, nor ever had been, habitually intemperate, the Company sought to protect itself against an improper use by him, in the future, of alcoholic stimulants, by the provision that the policy should become null and void "if he shall become so far intemperate as to impair health or induce delirium tremens." The court instructed the jury: "The impairment of health contemplated by this condition of the policy is not necessarily permanent or irremediable, nor is it the temporary indisposition or disturbance usually resulting from a drunken debauch; but it is the development of disease or the impairment of constitutional vigor by the use of intoxicating beverages in such a degree and for such a time as is ordinarily understood to constitute intemperance."

The defendant then asked the court to say to the jury that the words in the policy, "become so far intemperate as to impair health," do not necessarily imply habitual intemperance, and that an act of intemperance, producing impairment of health, was within the conditions of the policy, and rendered it null and void, except as provided where the premiums for three entire years had been paid, and the policy had ceased upon other grounds than fraud, misrepresentation, concealment, or false statement of the insured. The court declined to so instruct the jury, and said: "The words of the condition are to be expounded according to the common and popular acceptation of their meaning. In this sense of them a single excessive indulgence in alcoholic liquors is not intemperance; but there must be such frequency in their use, continued for a longer or shorter period, as indicates an injurious addiction to such indulgence." The effect of these and other instructions was that the condition that the policy should be void if the insured became so far intemperate as to impair his health, was not broken unless intemperance became the habit or rule of his life after the policy was issued. The jury may have believed—and there was some, we do not say conclusive, evidence, to justify them in so believing—that the efficient, controlling cause of the death of the insured was an excessive and continuous use of strong drinks for several days and nights immediately preceding his death; yet they were not at liberty, under the instructions, to find that he became so far intemperate as to impair his health, unless it further appeared that his intemperance in the use of alcoholic stimulants covered such a period of time as to constitute the habit of his life. This construction of the contract is, in our judgment, erroneous. If the substantial cause of the death of the insured was an excessive use of alcoholic stimulants, not taken in good faith for medical purposes or under medical advice, his health was impaired by intemperance, within the meaning of the words "so far intemperate as to impair his health," although he may not have had delirium tremens, and although, previously to his last illness, he had not indulged in strong drink for such a long period of time or so frequently as to become habitually intemperate. Whether death was so caused is a matter to be determined by the jury under all the evidence.

It is supposed by the plaintiff that the instructions of the court are sustained by North Western L. Ins. Co. v. Muskegon Nat. Bank, 122 U. S. 502 [30:1101]. In that case the insured answered "Yes, occasionally," to the question whether he then was or had ever been "in the habit of using alcoholic beverages or other stimulants;" and stipulated, in the application, that he was not then, and would not become, "habitually intemperate." The policy contained a provision, not fully set out in the report of the case, that it should be null and void if the insured "shall become either habitually intemperate or so far intemperate as to impair health or induce delirium tremens." No question was made or could have been made in this court in respect to the meaning of the words, "so far intemperate as to impair health," because the jury were instructed, at the request of the company, that if the insured, Comstock, became so far intemperate as to impair his health, they must find for the defendant. The contest in this court was as to what constituted habitual intemperance, and as to the rulings in the court below upon that point. Indeed, it was assumed at the trial of that case, as well as in this court, that there was, or might be a difference between habitual intemperance and intemperance that impaired health. There was, consequently, no occasion for this court, in that case, to decide what construction was to be put upon the words "so far intemperate as to impair health," when standing alone in a policy. The jury having found, under proper instructions, that the insured had not become so far intemperate as to impair his health, that finding was not open to review here. It is clear, therefore, that there is nothing in North Western L. Ins. Co. v. Muskegon Nat. Bank that concludes the present case, or that militates against our interpretation of the policy here in suit.

Other questions have been discussed by counsel; but, as they may not arise upon another trial, or in the precise form in which they are now presented, we will not consider them.

For the reasons stated, the judgment must be reversed, with directions for another trial in accordance with the principles of this opinion. It is so ordered.

THE DECISIONS

OF THE

Supreme Court of the United States,

AT

OCTOBER TERM, 1887.

[Authenticated copy of opinion record strictly followed, except as to such reference words and figures as are enclosed in brackets.]

ALFRED B. LAWTHER, Appt.,
v.
CHARLES S. HAMILTON et al.

Patent for treating oleaginous seeds—specification, effect of—purchase of instrument.

1. The patent granted to Alfred B. Lawther, Sept. 28, 1875, for certain improvements in processes of treating oleaginous seeds, is valid, as a patent for a process; and the discovery thereby patented is patentable; and the patent sufficiently describes the operation to be performed.
2. The specification of a patent is to be construed in the light of that knowledge which existed in the art at the time of its date.
3. The process, patented by the above mentioned patent, is to be limited, by the clear terms of the specification, to the use of the kind of instrumentality described, namely: in the first part of the process, to the use of powerful revolving rollers for crushing the seeds between them under pressure; and, so limited, the patent is sustainable.
4. The purchase of a set of these rollers, by defendant, with the knowledge and consent of the patentee, does not confer consent upon defendant to use the patented process.

Argued Oct. 28, 31, 1887. Decided Jan. 9, 1888.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Wisconsin. Reversed.

Action for infringing a patent. The circuit court dismissed the action. The plaintiff appealed to this court.

The facts and case are fully stated in the opinion.

Messrs. John W. Munday and Edmund Adcock, for appellant:

The subject matter of the patent sued upon is a process and patentable.

Cochrane v. Deener, 94 U. S. 780 (24: 139); Tilgham v. Proctor, 102 U. S. 708 (26: 279); Russell v. Cowley, 1 Web. Pat. Cas. 467.

The claim in the patent precisely covers the improvement made by Lawther, and no more.

A claim for a combination of several steps or elements is always to be construed as covering equivalents.

Seymour v. Osborne, 78 U. S. 11 Wall. 516 (20: 33); S. C. 2 Whitm. Pat. Cas. 292; Gould v. Rees, 82 U. S. 15 Wall. 187 (21: 89); S. C. 2 Whitm. Pat. Cas. 442; Goodyear v. N. J. Cent. R. R. Co. 2 Wall. Jr. 356; S. C. 1 Fish. Pat. Cas. 631.

The patent is for an entire process, made up of several constituents. The patentee does not claim to have been the inventor of the constituents. The exclusive use of them singly is not secured to him. What is secured is their use when arranged in the process.

Mowry v. Whitney, 2 Whitm. Pat. Cas. 436; Ryan v. Goodwin, 3 Sumn. 514; Lee v. Blandy, 2 Fish. Pat. Cas. 93; Gould v. Rees, 2 Whitm. Pat. Cas. 439; Howe v. Morton, 1 Fish. Pat. Cas. 586; Many v. Sizer, 1 Fish. Pat. Cas. 17.

Mr. Charles E. Shepard, for appellees:

The appellant's process is not a novel and patentable invention.

It is not a process within the sense of the patent law.

Mr. Justice Bradley delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellant, Alfred B. Lawther, filed his bill in the court below against the appellees, alleging that they were infringing a patent granted to him on the 28th of September, 1875, for certain improvements in processes of treating oleaginous seeds, and praying for an account of profits and damages, and an injunction. The circuit court, being of opinion that the patent could not be sustained as a patent for a process (which it was claimed to be) dismissed the bill. We are called upon to revise this decision.

In the specification of the patent the patentee states that the object of his invention is to improve the process of working flaxseed, linseed, and other oil seeds, in such a manner that a greater yield of oil is obtained at a considerable saving of time and power in the running of the crushing, mixing, and pressing machines, while also a cake of superior texture is produced.

The specification proceeds as follows: "Hitherto it has been the practice to crush the oil seeds between revolving rollers, and completing the imperfect crushing by passing them under heavy stones known as edge-runners or mullers, under addition of a quantity of water, the crushed and moistened seed being then taken from the muller stones and stirred in a heated steam jacketed reservoir preparatory to being placed into the presses for extracting the oil.

"This process has been found imperfect in regard to many points, but mainly on account of the over grinding of portions of the seed and the husks or bran when the seeds were exposed for too long a time to the action of the muller stones, so as to form a pasty mass and produce an absorption of oil by the fine particles of bran, while on the other hand the under grinding, by too short an action of the stones, rendered the presses incapable of extracting the full amount of oil from the seed. * * *

"My process is intended to remedy the defects of the one at present in use, and consists mainly in conveying the oil seeds through a vertical supply tube and feeding roller, at such degree of pressure to powerful revolving rollers that each seed is individually acted upon, and the oil cells fully crushed and disintegrated. They are then passed directly, without the use of muller stones, to the mixing machine to be stirred, moistened, and heated by the admission of small jets of water or steam to the mass, and then transferred to the presses.

"The oil seeds are by my new process first conveyed to a hopper and fluted seed roller at the top of an upright feed tube of the crushing machine, by which the seeds are fed, under suitable pressure, to revolving rollers of sufficient power, which run at a surface speed of about 150 to 200 feet per minute.

"The pressure on the seeds in the feed tube is necessary, as the oil seeds would otherwise not feed readily into rollers revolving under great pressure. The oil seeds are thereby compelled to pass evenly and steadily through the rollers, which have, therefore, a chance to act on all of them and break the oil cells uniformly without reducing any portion to a pasty condition. The bran is also left comparatively coarse, so that it shows the nature of the seed after pressing.

"The muller stones and their over or under grinding of any portion of the seeds are entirely done away with by this mode, which not only makes the machinery less expensive, but produces also a saving of power required in running the same. The crushed seeds are next placed in a steam jacketed reservoir of the mixing machine, where they are stirred, moistened, and heated by perforated revolving stirrer arms, which throw jets of water or steam into the mass so as to thoroughly permeate and mix the same. The crushed and moistened mass is transferred to the presses for the extraction of the oil, which operation requires less power on account of the uniformity of the mass, produces a greater yield of oil, and furnishes an improved quality of oil cake, or residue, of open grained, flaky nature, capable of being split in regular pieces at right angles to the direction of the pressure."

Having thus described his invention, the patentee states his claim to be the process of crushing oleaginous seeds and extracting the oil therefrom, consisting of the following successive steps, viz.: the crushing of the seeds under pressure, the moistening of the seeds by direct subjection to steam, and finally the expression of the oil from the seed by suitable pressure, as and for the purpose set forth.

The purpose and effect of the invention claimed by the patentee as a new process, and the argument against the validity of the patent as a patent for a process, cannot be better or more clearly stated than is done in the opinion of the court below, pronounced by Judge Dyer, 21 Fed. Rep. 811. We quote therefrom as follows: "The proofs show, and in fact it is undisputed, that formerly in the process of extracting oil from flaxseed, the seed was subjected to the crushing and disintegrating action of the muller stones, which consisted of two large and very heavy stone wheels, mounted on a short horizontal axis attached to a vertical shaft. By the rotation of this shaft the stones were caused to move on their edges shortly around in a circular path upon a stone bed plate, with a peculiar rolling and grinding action, upon a layer of flaxseed placed on the bed plate. This was the usual mechanical appliance in connection with the operating movement of the muller stones. By this means such portions of the seed as came in contact with the muller stones were reduced to a complete state of pulverization. To facilitate the disintegrating action of the muller stones, the seed was generally first more or less crushed by passing it through one or more pairs of rollers, thus better preparing it for the rubbing and grinding action of the muller stones. The further treatment of the seed required the application of heat and moisture, and this was accomplished in various ways. Sometimes the heat and moisture were applied by a steaming device before the seed was crushed by the muller stones; sometimes the seed was moistened when it was under the action of the muller stones by sprinkling water upon the layer of seed beneath the stones, the heat being applied afterwards by a separate operation. At other times both heat and moisture were applied after the seed had been run through the mullers, and was in the form of meal in the heater. As the last step in the process the seed thus crushed and disintegrated and, in moist and warm condition, was usually placed in haircloth mats or bags, and subjected to hydraulic pressure, by which means the oil was extracted. This was the state of the art, and this the usual process when the complainant obtained his patent."

The court then states the process set out in the appellants patent and, after some observations thereon, proceeds to say:

"The crushing of oleaginous seed, so that ultimately it may be in condition for the application of hydraulic pressure, was always a step and, necessarily, the first step in the process of extracting the oil therefrom. As we have seen, that step was formerly accomplished by means of rollers and muller stones. The complainant ascertained, by practice, that in crushing the seed the tearing, pulverizing action of the muller stones was injurious, and so he dispensed with that mechanical operation in the crushing step of the process, and employed the rollers alone. He thereby simply omitted one of the instrumentalities previously used in the first stage of treatment of the seed. This was undoubtedly a useful improvement, but it was not the invention or discovery of a new process. Each step in the process existed and was known before, namely: crushing the seed, beating and moistening it, and finally the application of hydraulic pressure. What the complainant accomplished was a change in mechanical appliances and operation, by which an existing process and each step thereof were made more effective in its results. For this he may have been entitled to a mechanical patent. * * * He discovered that more advantageous results were attainable by dispensing with the use of muller stones; and that these results were also promoted by the improved construction of the rollers and other mechanical appliances for heating and moistening the seed is quite apparent. The discovery or invention was not of a new series of acts or steps constituting a process, but only of certain mechanical changes in carrying into effect the well known old steps of the process."

The view thus taken by the court below seems to us open to some criticism. If, as that court says, and we think rightly says, the omission of the muller stones is a real improvement in the process of obtaining the oil from the flaxseed, if it produces more oil and better oil cakes, and it is new, and was not used before, why is it not a patentable discovery? And why is not such new method of obtaining the oil and making the oil cakes a process? There is no new machinery. The rollers are an old instrument, the mixing machinery is old, the hydraulic press is old; the only thing that is new is the mode of using and applying these old instrumentalities. And what is that but a new process? This process consists of a series of acts done to the flaxseed. It is a mode of treatment. The first part of the process is to crush the seeds between rollers. Perhaps, as this is the only breaking and crushing of the seed which is done, the rollers are required to be stronger than before. But if so, it is no less a process.

The evidence shows that, although the crushing of the seed by two horizontal rollers, and then passing it, thus crushed, under the muller stones, was the old method commonly used, yet that, for several years before Lawther took out his patent, a more thorough crushing had been effected by the employment of four or five strong and heavy rollers arranged on top of one another in a stack, still using the muller stones to grind and moisten the crushed seed after it was passed through the rollers. The invention of Lawther consisted in discarding the muller stones and passing the crushed seed directly into a mixing machine to be stirred, moistened and heated by jets of steam or water, and then transferring the mass to the presses for the expression of the oil by hydraulic or other power.

The machinery and apparatus used by Lawther had all been used before. His only discovery was an improvement in the process. He found that by altogether omitting one of the steps of the former process, the grinding and mixing under the muller stones, and mixing in the mixing machine by means of steam, a great improvement was effected in the result.

Why should it be doubted that such a discovery is patentable? It is highly useful, and it is shown by the evidence to have been the result of careful and long continued experiments, and the application of much ingenuity.

By the omission of the mullers greater care may be necessary on the part of the workman in carrying on the operations, especially in watching the moistening and mixing process so as to produce the proper moisture and consistency of the mass before subjecting it to hydraulic pressure. But though it be true that the new process does require greater care, and even greater skill, on the part of the workman than was formerly required, this does not change its character as being that of a process, nor does it materially affect its utility.

The only question which, in our view, raises a doubt on the validity of the patent is whether it sufficiently describes the process to be followed in order to secure the beneficial results which it promises. The patentee, when on the witness stand, stated that the invention was perfected on the second day of June, 1874; that it was the result of a long series of experiments which were not entirely successful until that date. His account of it is thus elicited on his cross examination:

57. When did this invention, as you claim it, as you describe it in this patent, first take tangible and practical shape in your mind as a whole process?

A. Complete and perfect in 1874.

58. What time?

A. Between the 31st of May and the second of June.

59. What was the particular improvement that produced the change in results at that time?

A. It was the perfecting of all of the improvements, the harmonious working of all the changes that we had made in the matter; most of the changes had taught us something, and when we learned it all we knew it.

60. What particular thing brought about that change at that time?

A. I don't know that I could locate any particular thing of any importance or magnitude.

61. What did you do different on the first or second of June or thereafter from what you had done on the 30th of May or theretofore?

A. I have answered that before as near as I can. I only know it was the culmination of all previous efforts, our knowledge, and our apparatus.

62. Was the change caused by anything more than your men's increased practical skill and experience in working seed in that new way?

A. Added to the apparatus, yes, sir; that was just it exactly. We couldn't have done it without the proper appliances; and with the proper appliances we couldn't have done it without the knowledge; the two things come together. The whole thing was a series of infinitely small steps.

63. Wasn't the apparatus the same on the 30th of May and after the second of June?

A. I have no record of any experiment or change having been made during that time, nor do I recollect of any changes. It is possible that it was precisely similar.

64. Isn't that your best recollection, that it is similar?

A. I have no recollection about it one way or the other. One of our greatest difficulties was the uniform moistening of the seed. We changed the moistening apparatus in a great many different ways. Some of them involved the delay of a day, some of them an hour, some of them a few minutes. Some such changes as that might have been made in the time spoken of.

65. No change was made in the rolls in that time, was there?

A. Not that I know of.

66. Nor in the heater apparatus or in the presses at that time?

A. No; we didn't change the body of that heater; probably not the presses.

67. On the 30th day of May, and some time previously, didn't you crush the seed under rolls as the first step?

A. Yes.

68. And then moisten it?

A. Yes.

69. And then heat it?

A. Yes.

70. And then extract the oil by pressure in the presses?

A. Yes; some of it; all that we did extract.

71. Are not those the same steps in the process of making oil that you used on the second of June, and ever since?

A. That is the process today."

From this statement it is apparent that the beneficial result is due, not only to a proper degree of crushing of the seed in the rolls, but to a proper and uniform moistening of the crushed material in the heating machine before it is subjected to pressure. The question is whether the patent sufficiently describes the operation to be performed in order to accomplish these results.

After a careful consideration of the specification of the patent, and in view of the principle of law that it is to be construed in the light of that knowledge which existed in the art at the time of its date, we are satisfied that it does sufficiently describe the process to be followed. Every step of this process was already understood, although not connected in the manner pointed out in the patent. The following things were known and used before the granting of the patent, to wit: first, the crushing of the seed between powerful revolving rollers, fed thereto by a supply tube and feeding roller, so as to pass in a sheet of uniform thickness between the rollers; second, the moistening, mixing and heating of the crushed mass by means of steam and water in a mixing machine; third, the pressure of the material thus prepared, in molds, by means of hydraulic power. These several steps being well known in the art when the patent was applied for, required no particular explanation. The patentee had only to say to the oil manufacturers of the country what he did say, namely: crush your seed evenly and sufficiently between powerful rollers as heretofore; and, then, instead of passing it under the muller stones, as you have heretofore done, transfer it immediately to the well known, steam mixing machine, and moisten and mix it equably and sufficiently for pressing. Every oil manufacturer in the country would understand him. They would also understand that it might require additional care and skill to make the new process work successfully. It is evident that they did understand him, and that the manufacture of linseed oil, and oil cakes, has ever since been greatly improved and facilitated by the invention.

But whilst we are satisfied that the invention is that of a process, it is nevertheless limited by the clear terms of the specification, at least so far as the crushing of the seed is concerned, to the use of the kind of instrumentality described, namely: in the first part of the process, to the use of powerful revolving rollers for crushing the seed between them under pressure. The claim cannot have the broad generality which its terms, taken literally, might at first sight seem to imply. But limited as suggested, it seems to us sustainable in law.

It is true that the description also calls for the use of a vertical supply tube and feeding roller. The latter is probably essential as a means of distributing the flow of the seed in a sheet of even thickness to the rolls. But the vertical supply tube is evidently an incidental arrangement, suited to one position of the rollers, namely: where a pair of rollers are set side by side. Where they form a pile, on top of one another, a vertical tube would be inapplicable. In such case the equivalent would be a slanting tube, or inclined plane. The vertical tube is clearly not an essential part of the instrumentality used, and constitutes no limitation of the process.

The appellees also contend that they do not (in the words of the claim) "moisten the seeds by direct subjection to steam." It is proven, however, that they do moisten the seeds by a shower of spray in the mixing machine, produced by directing a jet of steam against a small stream of water. This is within the claim of the patent. The specification describes the process of moistening the seeds as follows: "They are then passed (after being crushed) directly, without the aid of muller stones, to the mixing machine to be stirred, moistened and heated by the admission of small jets of water or steam to the mass." Again: "The crushed seeds are next placed in a steam jacketed reservoir of the mixing machine, where they are stirred, moistened and heated by perforated revolving stirrer arms which throw jets of water or steam into the mass," etc. Then the claim is for three successive steps, viz.: the crushing of the seeds under pressure, the moistening of the seeds by direct subjection to steam, and the expression of the oil by suitable pressure. These words are to be read in the light of the explanations in the descriptive part; and thus read, it is apparent that the meaning of the claim is that the crushed seeds are to be moistened and heated by the use of steam, or steam and water, immediately after coming from the rollers, without any aid from muller stones. This is precisely what the appellees do.

One of the defenses set up is an implied license. It seems that Lawther has another patent for some improvement in the stack of rollers now commonly used for crushing the seed, and supplies them to order through a foundryman by the name of McDonald. The appellees purchased a set of these rollers from McDonald, with the knowledge and consent of Lawther. These rollers were returned on account of some imperfection in the material; but the frame was retained, and the appellees procured similar rollers made elsewhere. They contend that by this transaction Lawther gave his consent to their use of his process. We do not think that there is sufficient evidence of any such consent. The use of the rollers did not necessarily involve the use of the process, and there is no proof that anything was said about the process.

Other points were raised which we do not deem it necessary to discuss. We cannot but think that Lawther discovered a new process of manufacturing oil from seeds, and that he was entitled to a patent therefor; and we are of opinion that the patent in suit, construed as we have suggested, is a good and valid patent. We are also of opinion that the appellees infringe the patent, and that they have not shown any legal defense to the suit. It follows that the appellant is entitled to a decree for an injunction and an account of profits and damages, as prayed in the bill.

The decree of the Circuit Court is therefore reversed, and the cause remanded, with instructions to enter a decree for the appellant, and take such further proceedings as may be in conformity with this opinion.

UNITED STATES, ex rel. J. K. McLEAN, Plff. in Err.,

v.

WILLIAM F. VILAS, Postmaster-General.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 86-97.)

Readjustment of postmasters' salaries—when made—basis of.

1. Under the statutes on the subject, the postmaster-general is not under legal obligation to readjust the salaries of postmasters oftener than once in two years.

2. The postmaster-general is expressly authorized, within his discretion, to make such readjustment, in special cases, upon satisfactory representation, as much oftener as he may deem expedient.

3. Such readjustment, when it takes place, can only establish the amount of the salary for two years thereafter; and no such readjustment can be made, unless there are quarterly returns for two years preceding such readjustment, on which it can be based.

Argued Nov. 21, 22, 1887. Decided Jan. 9, 1888.

IN ERROR to the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia. Affirmed.

A judgment of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia was rendered in favor of the Postmaster-General, in an action for a writ of mandamus to compel him to readjust the plaintiff's salary.

The facts and case are fully stated in the opinion.

Messrs. S. F. Phillips and H. Spaulding, for the relator:

The ministerial duty imposed upon the Postmaster-General by the Statutes of 1864, 1866 and 1883 required readjustment for cases like that of the relator from one quarter to another; each readjustment to be upon the basis of the quarter preceding, and to take effect for the quarter following. The Act of 1886 is without effect upon this case.

Messrs. A. H. Garland, Atty-Gen. Robt. A. Howard, Asst. Atty-Gen., and Edwin E. Bryant, Asst. Atty-Gen. P. O. Dept., for defendant in error:

The writ of mandamus can issue against the head of the department only to compel the performance of a simple ministerial duty, involving the exercise of no discretion.

Kendall v. U. S. 37 U. S. 12 Pet. 524 (9:1181); Decatur v. Paulding, 39 U. S. 14 Pet. 521 (10:571); U. S. v. Guthrie, 58 U. S. 17 How. 302 (15:105); Hull v. Comr. of Patents, 2 MacAr. 189; Ex rel. Bigelow, 2 MacAr. 24; U. S. v. Edmunds, 72 U. S. 5 Wall. 563 (18:692); Cox v. U. S. 76 U. S. 9 Wall. 312 (19:583); U. S. v. Key, 3 MacAr. 328; U. S. v. McLean, 95 U. S. 750 (24:579).

The courts will not send this writ to compel the head of a department to revise and overrule the judgment and action of his predecessor, even if that action and judgment be erroneous.

U. S. v. Chandler, 2 Mackey, 527; U. S. v. Bank of Metropolis, 40 U. S. 15 Pet. 401 (10:788); 5 Ops. Attys-Gen. 29, 240; 9 Ops. Attys-Gen. 300 and 387; 12 Ops. Attys-Gen. 169, 356; 13 Ops. Attys-Gen. 33 and 226, 387, 457; 14 Ops. Attys-Gen. 275; Ill. v. U. S. 20 Ct. Cl. 342; Jackson v. U. S. 19 Ct. Cl. 505; U. S. v. Stone, 69 U. S. 2 Wall. 535 (17:767).

The Act of 1883 was an act of grace on the part of Congress. Postmasters who had lost their rights by laches could not sue in the Court of Claims, because a readjustment was first necessary.

Mandamus is but an action at law.

Kendall v. Stokes, 44 U. S. 3 How. 100 (11:512); Kentucky v. Dennison, 65 U. S. 24 How. 97 (16:725).

The Act prohibiting the institution of this action took effect, by approval, August 4, 1886.

Matthews v. Zane, 20 U. S. 7 Wheat. 164, 211 (5:425,436); Lapeyre v. U. S. 84 U. S. 17 Wall. 198 (21:607); U. S. v. Norton, 97 U. S. 164 (24:907).

Mr. Justice Miller delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a writ of error to the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia.

In the case of U. S. v. McLean, 95 U. S. 750 [24:579], will be found the report of the decision of this court in an action instituted by the present plaintiff in error against the United States. The appeal was taken from a judgment of the Court of Claims in favor of McLean for the sum of $569.50, for compensation as deputy postmaster at Florence, Kansas, from April 14, 1871, to July 1, 1872, which was rendered on the ground that he was entitled to a readjustment of his salary by the Postmaster-General the salary allowed was 10 per centum less than it would have been upon the basis of commissions under the Act of 1854; such readjustments to be made in accordance with the mode presented in section 8 of the Act of June 12, 1866, and to date from the beginning of the quarter succeeding that in which such sworn returns of receipts and business, or quarterly returns, were made; Provided, That every readjustment of salary under this Act shall be upon a written application, signed by the postmaster or late postmaster, or legal representative, entitled to said readjustment; and that each payment made shall be by warrant or check on the Treasurer or some assistant treasurer of the United States, made payable to the order of said applicant, and forwarded by mail to him at the postoffice within whose delivery he resides, and which address shall be set forth in the application above provided for." 22 U. S. Stat. at L. 487.

With the answer of the Postmaster-General are presented as exhibits two opinions of Attorney-General Brewster, given in response to requests of the Postmaster-General; also an opinion by the Assistant Attorney-General for the Postoffice Department; and the opinion of Postmaster-General Gresham in a letter to the Hon. Frank Hatton, First Assistant Postmaster-General. All of these sustain the proposition already stated on behalf of the defendant.

These, with the argument of counsel, and the briefs now before us, cover the whole field of controversy. Many objections are taken by the counsel for the defendant which would be worthy of serious consideration if it were necessary to decide them; but as we agree with the Postmaster-General in such a construction of these statutes as shows that they imposed no obligation upon him to make the readjustment of salary claimed by the plaintiff, and as this goes to the merits of the controversy, we prefer to rest the case on this point without any consideration of the others.

Upon a very careful examination of these statutes we are forced to the conclusion that the Legislature in these enactments did not contemplate a readjustment of the salaries of any of these officers oftener than once in two years, as a legal duty or obligation upon the part of the Postmaster-General. It is true, undoubtedly, that many cases of hardship might arise for want of a more frequent adjustment. In towns where the population and business grew very rapidly an adjustment made at a time when the compensation would amount to $3 or $4 a quarter might be very inadequate, when, if readjusted according to the later returns, the salary might amount to $600 or $800 per annum, while the officer, if he served at all, would be compelled to serve at the inconsiderable compensation originally established.

The answer to this suggestion is that the Postmaster-General was expressly authorized, within his discretion, to make readjustments in special cases, upon satisfactory representations, as much oftener as he might deem expedient. The very fact that this discretion was left to him in these special cases, and the rule which should govern him in the exercise of that power was left to his sense of right and propriety, is an argument against the necessity of any more frequent readjustments than once in two years, as a positive duty arising from a proper construction of the statutes.

The Act of 1864, which abolished the system of compensation by a fixed commission on all the receipts at the postoffices, evidently adopted a principle of establishing a salary for two years, which was to be fixed by a relation in each of the five classes of postmasters, to the amount received at those offices. It enacts that the compensation of the postmasters of the several offices, except the office at New York, for the two consecutive years next preceding the first day of July, 1864, shall be the basis at which the salaries of those offices shall be fixed for the next two years. The second section declares that the Postmaster-General shall review once in two years, and, in special cases, upon satisfactory representation, as much oftener as he may deem expedient, and readjust, on the basis of the preceding section and of the rates there fixed, the salary assigned by him to any office; and that any change made in such salary shall not take effect until the first day of the quarter next following such order.

Here is a very clear statement that the salaries of these offices are to be fixed once in two years, that this shall be done by the Postmaster-General, and that it shall be based upon the receipts at those offices for the two consecutive years next preceding the time when it is made. The manifest purpose of this statute is, first, to change the compensation of the postmaster from a mere fixed commission on the receipts of his office to a regular salary; second, that this salary shall be fixed for a period of two years prospectively; and third, that, owing to the varying amount of receipts at postoffices, which may rapidly grow, the Postmaster-General is required to make, on the basis already given, a readjustment once in two years. If, as already said, cases of great hardship, where there is a sudden increase of business, seem to demand a more frequent readjustment, the power to do this is left with the Postmaster-General, but rests entirely in his discretion.

The statutory provision on which it is asserted that a change of this rule rests, so that it is the duty of the Postmaster-General to make a readjustment at the end of any quarter where the return from an office shows that the salary allowed is 10 per cent less than it would be on the basis of the commissions under the Act of 1854, is the proviso found in section 8 of the Act of 1866, which reads as follows: "Provided, That when the quarterly returns of any postmaster of the third, fourth, or fifth class show that the salary allowed is 10 per centum less than it would be on the basis of commissions under the Act of 1854 fixing compensation, then the Postmaster-General shall review and readjust under the provision of said section."

What quarterly returns are here meant, as showing that the salary is 10 per cent less than the commissions under the Act of 1854? The argument of counsel is that when any one quarterly return shall show this condition of affairs the Postmaster-General, on the request of the postmaster, must make a readjustment; but such is not the language of the statute. The expression used is "when the quarterly returns" shall show this; and, inasmuch as the law had already established that readjustments must be made on the basis of the quarterly returns for two years, it is reasonable to suppose that that was the meaning of Congress in this proviso.

To require the Postmaster-General, who alone can make these readjustments, to act upon every case where the last quarterly return shows a case for a readjustment, would be imposing a duty which it would be impossible for one man to perform, and which in itself would be an inconvenience not justified by any benefit to the incumbents of such offices. This compensation might vacillate every quarter. A salary might be increased one quarter, and it might be proper to diminish it the next; so that, instead of having a salary, or yearly compensation, as we think the spirit of all the statutes requires, and as it must be prospective, it would be in the end paying a man for a future quarter a compensation which he had earned on a past quarter. The whole spirit of the statutes seems to imply that the returns for the past two years are to be taken as the best conjectural basis that can be obtained for fixing the salary for two years in the future. Before we can adopt such a construction, therefore, as is contended for by plaintiff's counsel, words imperatively declaring such a proposition should be found in the statutes.

The language which is used in the proviso, instead of declaring, as could easily have been done, that the return of every quarter shall be the basis upon which to determine the compensation of the officer for the next succeeding quarter, is "that when the quarterly returns of any postmaster" of the classes specified "show that the salary allowed is 10 per centum less than it would be on the basis of commissions under the Act of 1854, fixing compensation, then the Postmaster-General shall review and readjust the salary under the provisions of said section." The provisions of that section, as we have already seen, direct the Postmaster-General to review and readjust the salaries of postmasters, once in two years, except in special cases, upon the basis of the preceding section, namely: section 2 of the Act of 1864.

That basis of the preceding section is the returns for the two years consecutively preceding the readjustment; so that, taking the use of the plural, "quarterly returns," instead of the singular, "any quarterly return;" taking the reference to the second section of the Act of 1864, which is the basis of the whole system, as the provision under which the readjustment shall be made; and the clear statement of that section that the review shall be made once in two years, and shall be based on the provisions of section 1 of the same statute, which requires returns of two consecutive years,—we do not think that the proviso is fairly susceptible of the construction which counsel for plaintiff claim for it.

If that construction be a sound one, the salary for the first quarter under it might not be half as much as would be a proper compensation for the preceding quarter on the same basis, and the return of a postmaster for the quarter on which this basis may be made, while doing him no good, might produce a very exaggerated salary for the man who should succeed him at the end of the quarter. We see nothing in this construction which commends it to the wisdom of Congress, and we see nothing in the language used by Congress which requires it. It is in conflict with the opinions of the two able Postmasters-General who have had the question under consideration, as well as with those of the Attorney-General and his assistant; and it is also opposed to our own judgment of its fair meaning, taken in connection with the whole legislation on the subject.

As the record shows that there were not returns from the post office of the plaintiff for two years preceding the time when he demanded that a readjustment should take place, and also that a readjustment was made for the period from July 1, 1872, to July 1, 1874, it is obvious, according to this construction of the statutes, that there is no duty on the Postmaster-General to make the readjustment asked for.

The judgment of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia is, therefore, affirmed.

Removal of action—when to be done.

1. A petition for a removal of a cause from a state court must be filed at or before the term at which the cause could be first tried in the state court.
2. Where a cause is removed for trial from the state court of one county to the state court of another county a removal of the cause to the United States Court is too late, unless the petition for removal is filed at or before the term at which the cause could be first tried in the former county.

Submitted Dec. 15, 1887. Decided Jan. 9, 1888.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Maryland, to review an order of that court remanding the suit to the State Court from which it had been removed. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. John K. Cowen and Hugh L. Bond, Jr., for plaintiff in error:

The December Term was the trial term of this case, and not the September Term, as contended by defendants in error.

Pullman Palace Car Co. v. Speck, 118 U. S. 87 (28: 926).

Mr. Albert Constable, for defendants in error:

The September Term of the Circuit Court for Cecil County was the term at which plaintiff in error was bound to file its petition, if it wished the cause removed.

Gregory v. Hartley, 113 U. S. 745 (28: 1151); Act of March, 1875, chap. 137, § 3; Babbitt v. Clark, 103 U. S. 606 (26: 507).

Mr. Chief Justice Waite delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a writ of error for the review of an order of the circuit court made March 5, 1886, remanding a suit which had been removed from a state court under the Act of March 3, 1875, chap. 137, 18 Stat. at L. 470. The material facts are these:

The suit was begun in the Circuit Court of Cecil County, Maryland, and it stood for trial at the December Term of that court in the year 1884. During that term the Railroad Company petitioned the court for the removal of the suit to the Circuit Court of Dorchester County for trial, and this was granted January 22, 1885. The cause was docketed in Dorchester County February 2, 1885, and on the 22d of April, 1885, the Railroad Company filed in that county its petition for the removal of the suit to the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Maryland, on the ground that the plaintiffs, Burns and Nokes, were citizens of New Jersey and Pennsylvania respectively, and the Railroad Company, the defendant, a Maryland corporation, and in law a citizen of that State. A removal was ordered by the Dorchester Court April 27, 1885, which was at its April Term, 1885, and the cause entered in the Circuit Court of the United States May 16, 1885. A motion to remand was made November 2, 1885; and this motion was granted March 5, 1886, on the ground that the petition for removal was not in time.

In our opinion this order was properly made. According to the agreed facts the Circuit Court of Cecil County holds four terms in each year, commencing respectively on the third Monday of March, the third Monday of June, the third Monday of September, and the third Monday of December. It is conceded that the cause could have been forced to trial at the December Term, 1885, if it had remained in Cecil County. The terms in Dorchester County begin on the fourth Monday of the months of January, April and July, and on the second Monday of November in each year. Although the record from Cecil County was filed in Dorchester County on the second day of February, and the petition for removal filed on the 22d of April, it does not appear that it was brought to the attention of the court or any action taken thereon until the 27th of that month, which was the first day of the April Term. Under these circumstances it is clear that the petition for removal was not presented in time. The first term of the state court at which the cause could have been tried was the December Term in Cecil County. That term must have ended on or before the third Monday in March. The transfer was made to Dorchester County during the January Term of that court. That was another term of the state court from that in which the trial could first be had. Consequently, the time for removal had passed when the case got to Dorchester County. The Railroad Company had its election at the December Term in Cecil County to remove the suit to the Circuit Court of the United States or to transfer it to Dorchester County for trial. It chose the latter and thereby lost its right to the removal.

The order to remand is affirmed.

Facts found by referee—market value — settlement—exception.

4. This court cannot, on this writ of error, review any of the exceptions taken to the admission or exclusion of evidence or to the findings of fact by the referee or any exceptions to his refusal to find facts as requested, the case not having been tried by the circuit court on the filing in writing of a waiver of a trial by jury.

Howard v. Daly, 61 N. Y. 362; Hetherington v. Kemp, 4 Camp. 193; Dana v. Kemble, 19 Pick. 112.

Mr. Justice Blatchford delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action at law, brought in the Circuit Court of the United States for the Northern District of New York, by Henry M. Benjamin, a citizen of Wisconsin, against Henry C. Roberts and Archibald S. Clarke, citizens of New York, composing the firm of H. C. Roberts & Co., doing business at Rochester, New York, to recover damages for the alleged failure of the defendants to deliver to the plaintiff a quantity of iron, on a contract for its sale by the former to the latter.

The complaint alleged that at the time of the breach of the contract by the defendants the market value of iron of the kind and quality agreed to be sold was much greater than the contract price of the iron, and that, if the iron had been delivered pursuant to the contract, the plaintiff could have sold it at a large profit.

The defendants, in their answer, besides denying any liability to the plaintiff, set up by way of counterclaim: (1) that the plaintiff was indebted to them in the sum of $796.99, for coal and iron sold and delivered by them to him, and that, as a part of the contract for the sale of the iron upon which the action was brought, it was a condition that the plaintiff should pay to the defendants the $796.99, which he had not done; (2) that, on the sale and delivery to the plaintiff by the defendants of certain coal, the plaintiff had claimed various items of shortage in the coal, for which the defendants had allowed to him $1,926.73; that they had afterwards ascertained that the statements of the plaintiff as to the shortage were untrue, and that they were ready to deliver the iron upon the payment to them by the plaintiff of the $1,926.73.

The reply of the plaintiff admitted an indebtedness to the defendants of $112.73, on account of the item of $796.99 claimed in the answer; and in regard to the $1,926.73, it alleged that the items of shortage had been allowed and agreed to by the defendants.

After issue was joined, it was stipulated in writing by the parties, that the action be referred to a person named, "as sole referee, to hear, try and determine the issues therein." Upon this stipulation, an order was entered by the court that the action be referred to such person, "to determine the issues therein."

The referee filed his report as follows:

"I, the undersigned, the referee to whom were referred the issues in the action above entitled, do respectfully report that I have heard the allegations and proofs of the respective parties, and the arguments of counsel thereon, and, after due deliberation, report the following as my findings of facts:

"First. The plaintiff is a citizen of the State of Wisconsin, and resides in the City of Milwaukee, in said State; and the defendants, on and prior to the 17th day of July, 1879, were, have since then continued to be, and now are, citizens of the State of New York, residing at Rochester, in said State, and partners in business in said city, under the firm name of H. C. Roberts & Co.

"Second. On or about the 17th day of July, 1879, the plaintiff inquired of the said defendants, by telegraph, their lowest price for 400 tons of number 2 iron and 400 tons of number 1 iron, or one cargo of each, delivered afloat at Milwaukee; to which, on the 22d day of July, 1879, the said defendants replied by telegram, stating the price at $19.50 cash, per ton, for number 1 foundry iron delivered afloat at Milwaukee, and declining to put any price or to make any agreement for the sale of number 2 iron; and in a letter written on the following day promised and agreed to ship a cargo of the iron about the first day of September, 1879, if the plaintiff should accept the offer.

"On the 25th of July, 1879, the plaintiff, by letter, accepted the offer of a cargo of the iron, at $19.50 per ton afloat at Milwaukee, provided that the plaintiff should be allowed the deduction from the price per ton, if freight could be had for less than $1 per ton; and also provided that the terms should be, instead of cash, a credit of four months, with interest at the rate of 7 per cent per annum after thirty days.

"The defendants, by letter dated July 28th, 1879, accepted the modification of the terms and conditions of sale, and agreed to ship the iron about September 1, 1879, or as soon as they could manufacture it.

"Third. The term 'cargo,' employed in this correspondence, was understood by the plaintiff and the defendants to mean a cargo of 400 tons.

"Fourth. The contract for the delivery of the cargo of iron had no relation to or connection with any other dealings between the parties, and the performance thereof by the defendants was not conditioned upon the performance of any act on the part of the plaintiff other than as stated in the preceding findings.

"Fifth. The defendants did not deliver the iron or any part of it to the plaintiff on or about the time specified in their offer, nor did they deliver it as soon as they had manufactured the required amount. They postponed the execution of the contract from time to time, and finally insisted, as a condition of the delivery of the iron, that the plaintiff should pay certain outstanding indebtedness on other dealings, which the defendants claimed to be due to them from the plaintiff; and also, as a further condition, that payment for the iron should be made upon delivery, that shipment should be by rail instead of by boat, and in installments of 100 tons per month, instead of one cargo of the full amount, and that the plaintiff should pay, in addition to the contract price, $1 per ton for extra freight. The plaintiff did not comply with these conditions, and the iron has never been delivered.

"Sixth. At the time when the letter containing these conditions was sent by the defendants to the plaintiff, November 7, 1879, the market value of number 1 foundry iron of the kind manufactured by the defendants was $34 per ton afloat in Milwaukee.

"Seventh. From May, 1878, to November, 1878, the defendants delivered to the plaintiff 435 tons of iron, of the value of $17 per ton, to be accounted for by the plaintiff to the defendants at that price. The plaintiff has accounted and paid for all of this iron except 6 $\frac{1}{2}\frac{7}{2}\frac{7}{2}$ tons, for which amount payment has not been made, nor has the iron been returned to the defendants. A statement of this account was submitted by the defendants to the plaintiff, showing that there was due and unpaid thereon $117.02, on the 18th day of June, 1879.

"Eighth. Between April 20, 1876, and October 5, 1878, the defendants sold and delivered to the plaintiff a quantity of coal, a statement of the weights and prices of which was rendered by the defendants to the plaintiff. Upon receipt of the cargoes at Milwaukee, the coal was weighed at the dock by the plaintiff, and thereafter he submitted to the defendants a statement of the weights and demanded a deduction on account of shortage in weight, which he claimed to exist. The defendants assented to and allowed the claim for shortage, and the plaintiff paid the balance of the account in full. The claim for shortage was made by the plaintiff in good faith, upon the basis of weights taken at his dock; and the defendants did not in any manner object to the plaintiff's claim until after he had insisted upon the performance of the contract upon which this action was brought.

"Ninth. In the months of October and November, 1878, the defendants sold and delivered to the plaintiff coal at certain prices, which, with the interest added to the day of the adjustment of the account, April 16, 1879, amounted to the sum of $20,804.71. Of this amount the plaintiff paid to the defendant sums of money from time to time, which, with interest to the said 16th day of April, 1879, amounted to $19,678.94. A statement of said account was made by the defendants to the plaintiff, showing a balance due from the latter to the former on said day, amounting to $625.77. This balance has not, nor has any part of it, been paid by the plaintiff to the defendants.

"Upon these facts I do respectfully report as my conclusions of law:

"First. The plaintiff is entitled to recover from the defendants the difference between the contract price of the 400 tons of iron which were to be delivered about the first of September, 1879, and the market value of the said iron afloat in Milwaukee, on the 7th day of November, 1879, when the contract was finally broken by the said defendants, amounting to the sum of $5,800, with interest from November 7, 1879, to the date of this report.

"Second. The plaintiff is indebted to the defendants in the sum of $117.02, with interest from June 18, 1879, for the 6 $\frac{1}{2}\frac{7}{2}\frac{7}{2}$ tons of iron as stated in the seventh finding of fact, amounting, at the date of this report, to the sum of $148.20; and they are entitled to have the said amount offset against the amount otherwise due from them to the plaintiff, as stated in the first conclusion of law.

"Third. The plaintiff is indebted to the defendants in the sum of $625.77, with interest from April 16, 1879, for the balance of the account for coal sold to the plaintiff, as stated in the ninth finding of facts, amounting, at the date of this report, to the sum of $799; and they are entitled to have the said amount offset against the amount otherwise due from them to the plaintiff, as stated in the first conclusion of law.

"Fourth. The defendants have not established their right to reopen the account between them and the plaintiff for coal delivered from April 20, 1876, and October 5, 1878, as stated in the eighth finding of facts; and they are therefore concluded by the settlement and adjustment made in that respect, and not entitled to the counterclaim in that behalf stated in their answer herein.

"Fifth. The plaintiff is entitled to judgment against the defendants for the sum of $6,264.12, with interest thereon from the date of this report, with the costs of this action, and judgment for that amount is accordingly directed."

The defendants moved the court for a new trial upon a case and exceptions, made according to the practice in the State of New York, in which they excepted to the first, fourth, and fifth conclusions of law found by the referee; but the motion was denied, and the court thereupon made an order denying it, and directing "that judgment be entered herein pursuant to the report of the referee, with costs." Thereupon, judgment was entered for the plaintiff for the $6,264.12, and $192.08 interest from the date of the report, and $399.70 costs, amounting in all to $6,855.90. The defendants have brought a writ of error to review the judgment.

The item of recovery allowed to the plaintiff by the referee was for 400 tons of iron at $14.50 per ton, being the difference between $19.50, the contract price, and $34, the market value on November 7, 1879.

The only questions open to review here are whether there was any error of law in the judgment rendered by the Circuit Court upon the facts found by the referee. The judgment having been entered "pursuant to the report of the referee," the facts found by him are conclusive in this court. Thornton v. Carson, 11 U. S. 7 Cranch, 596, 601 [3: 451, 452]; Alexandria Canal Co. v. Swann, 46 U. S. 5 How. 83 [12: 60]; York & C. R. R. Co. v. Myers, 59 U. S. 18 How. 246 [15: 380]; Heckers v. Fowler, 69 U. S. 2 Wall. 123 [17: 759]; Bond v. Dustin, 112 U. S. 604, 606, 607 [28: 835, 836]; Paine v. Central

The second and third findings of fact show that there was a complete, valid and binding contract made between the parties, which was not void for uncertainty, or for any other reason. It is expressly found that the term "cargo," employed in the correspondence between the parties by which the contract was entered into, was understood by both of them to mean a cargo of 400 tons. It is also expressly found that the contract for the delivery of the iron had no relation to or connection with any other dealings between the parties, and that the performance thereof by the defendants was not conditioned upon the performance of any act on the part of the plaintiff, other than as stated in the second and third findings of fact.

It is contended by the defendants that the referee erred in taking the $34 per ton, the market value of the iron on November, 7, 1879, as the measure of damages, instead of the market price in September, when the iron was to be delivered, and when, it is alleged, the breach of the contract occurred. But, although the defendants did not deliver any of the iron on or about September 1, 1879, nor as soon as they had manufactured the required amount, yet it appears from the findings of fact, considered together, that the breach of the contract did not take place until November 7, 1879. The statement in the findings, that the defendants "postponed the execution of the contract from time to time," and finally insisted upon certain requirements as conditions of the delivery of the iron, must be accepted as a statement that the postponement of the execution of the contract from time to time down to November 7, 1879, was with the assent of the plaintiff. From the fact that, as late as November 7, 1879, the defendants were naming conditions on which they would deliver the iron, it must be inferred that the question of delivery was still regarded by both parties as an open one, and that the mere failure to deliver the iron by the first of September, 1879, or even thereafter as soon as the required amount had been manufactured, was not regarded by either party as a breach of the contract. It was in the power of the defendants, instead of merely postponing the execution of the contract from time to time, to have absolutely refused to perform it, if they found that the price of iron was rising in the market, as is alleged in argument. But it is not found as a fact by the referee that there was any advance in the market value of the iron in question between September 1, 1879, or the time the iron was manufactured, and November 7, 1879, nor is the price of the iron in the market found as a fact, at any other date than November 7, 1879.

On the findings of fact, the rule of damages applied to this case was in accordance with the authorities. Benjamin, Sales, § 872; 2 Sedgwick, Damages, 7th ed. 184, note b; Ogle v. Vane, L. R. 2 Q. B. 275, and in the Exchequer Chamber, L. R. 3 Q. B. 272; Hickman v. Haynes, L. R. 10 C. P. 598; Hill v. Smith, 34 Vt. 535, 547; Newton v. Wales, 3 Robt. 458.

It is also alleged for error, that the referee erred in refusing to open the account between the parties and to allow the defendants' counterclaim for $1,926.73, as wrongfully charged to them by the plaintiff for shortages on coal. The finding of the referee is that the plaintiff, after weighing the coal, submitted to the defendants a statement of the weights and asked a deduction on account of shortage; that the defendants assented to and allowed the claim; that the plaintiff paid the balance of the account in full; that the claim for shortage was made by the plaintiff in good faith, upon the basis of weights taken at his dock; and that the defendants did not in any manner object to the plaintiff's claim until after he had insisted upon the performance of the contract on which this action was brought. On these facts the referee found as a conclusion of law that the defendants had not established their right to reopen the account for the coal in question; that they were concluded by the settlement and adjustment made in that respect; and that they were not entitled to the counterclaim in that behalf stated in their answer.

The answer alleged, in respect to such counterclaim, that the statements of the weight of the coal made by the plaintiff to the defendants were false, and were so known to be by the plaintiff, and that the amount which he had received from the defendants for shortage was obtained from them by his unlawful act. No facts in support of this allegation of the answer are found by the referee, and his conclusion of law was correct.

This case not having been tried by the circuit court on the filing of a waiver, in writing, of a trial by jury, this court cannot on this writ of error review any of the exceptions taken to the admission or exclusion of evidence, or any of the exceptions to the findings of fact by the referee, or to his refusal to find facts as requested. Bond v. Dustin, 112 U. S. 604, 606, 607 [28: 835, 836]; Paine v. Central Vermont R. R. Co. 118 U. S. 152, 158 [30: 198, 195].

CHARLES S. HINCHMAN, Plff. in Err.,
v.
RUFUS P. LINCOLN.

Statute of Frauds—receipt and acceptance—rescission of sale—vendee—effect of action.

1. It is a question for the jury whether, under all the circumstances, the acts which the buyer does or forbears to do amount to a receipt and acceptance, within the terms of the Statute of Frauds. But where the facts in relation to a contract of sale, alleged to be within the Statute of Frauds, are not in dispute, it belongs to the court to determine their legal effect.

2. To satisfy the Statute there must be a delivery by the vendor, with an intention of vesting the right of possession in the vendee; and there must be an actual acceptance by the latter with the intention of taking possession as owner; mere words are not sufficient to constitute a delivery and acceptance which will take a verbal contract of sale out of the Statute of Frauds.

3. Where the vendor made a written demand, upon one to whom he had delivered securities for the defendant, for the immediate return of the securities, on the ground that defendant had refused to fulfill the contract for their purchase, this act was inconsistent with the assertion that there had been, prior to that time, any delivery by plaintiff to defendant of the securities, and was a distinct rescission of the contract of sale.

4. In order that a receipt and acceptance shall be sufficient to take the case out of the prohibition of the statute, the acceptance by the vendee must be in the quality of vendee; and the act or acts relied on as constituting a receipt and acceptance must be such as definitely establish that the relation of vendor and vendee exists.

5. Where there was no transfer of possession of the securities to the defendant, and no agreement by the person holding the securities to hold them as his agent by consent of defendant as vendee, under a contract of sale with the plaintiff, the bringing of an action by the plaintiff to recover the consideration of the sale, is not a waiver of the condition of the previous payment of the consideration, nor an authorization to such person to deliver the securities to the defendant without performance of the contract on his part.

Argued Nov. 18, 21, 1887. Decided Jan. 9, 1888.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York. Reversed.

Action to recover the agreed price of certain securities alleged to have been sold and delivered by the plaintiff to the defendant. A verdict was rendered in favor of plaintiff, on which judgment was entered; to reverse which this writ of error is prosecuted.

The facts are fully stated in the opinion.

Messrs. A. H. Wintersteen, Wayne MacVeagh and Theo. F. H. Meyer, for plaintiff in error:

Van Rensselaer was at best a special agent. His real authority is all that may be allowed to govern in the case.

Mere delivery without acceptance is insufficient.

Lapse of time connected with other circumstances may show an acceptance.

Bushel v. Wheeler, 15 Q. B. 442.

Mr. Justice Matthews delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action at law brought by Rufus P. Lincoln, a citizen of New York, against Charles S. Hinchman, a citizen of Pennsylvania, to recover $18,000 as the agreed price and value of certain securities, stocks and bonds alleged to have been sold and delivered by the plaintiff to the defendant. The sale is alleged to have taken place on July 8, 1882. It is set forth in the complaint that the plaintiff acquired title to the securities in question by purchase of one John R. Bothwell, subject to any claim Wells, Fargo & Company had upon the same for advances made by them to or for the account of the said Bothwell; "That thereafter this plaintiff paid to Wells, Fargo & Company the amount of their said advances and took possession of said securities, stocks and bonds, but stated to the above named defendant that he was willing and would pay over to the Stormont Silver Mining Company, which company was a large creditor of the said Bothwell, and in which company said defendant was very largely interested, any surplus which he derived in any way from said securities, stocks and bonds, after having reimbursed himself in the sum of about $26,000 and interest for advances theretofore made by him to and for the account of the said Bothwell."

The answer denied the alleged sale and delivery. The action was tried in the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York by a jury. There was a verdict in favor of the plaintiff, on which judgment was rendered, to reverse which this writ of error is prosecuted.

A bill of exceptions sets out all the evidence in the cause, together with the charge of the court, and the exceptions taken to its rulings. At the close of the testimony, defendant's counsel, among other things, requested the court to charge the jury "That there is no evidence in the case of a completed sale of the securities to the defendant, and the plaintiff therefore cannot recover." This request was refused, and an exception taken by the defendant. This raises the general question whether there was sufficient evidence in support of the plaintiff's case to justify the court in submitting it to the jury. The defense rested upon two propositions: 1, that there was no evidence of any agreement between the parties for a sale and purchase; and 2, that, if there were, the agreement was not in writing, and there had been no receipt and acceptance of the subject of the sale or any part thereof by the defendant, and that consequently the agreement was within the prohibition of the Statute of Frauds in New York.

In regard to the first branch of the defense, we think there was sufficient evidence of a verbal agreement between the parties for the sale of the securities at the price named. It appeared in evidence that the plaintiff, having acquired title and possession to the securities previously belonging to Bothwell by paying off the advances due to Wells, Fargo & Company, agreed with the defendant, as representing the Stormont Silver Mining Company, to give to that company and other creditors of Clark and Bothwell the benefit of any surplus there might be after the payment of the amount due to the plaintiff. There is evidence tending to show that thereupon, a suggestion having been made that the defendant should purchase the securities from the plaintiff, it was agreed between them that the plaintiff would sell and the defendant would take them at the price of $18,000, and the next day at 3 o'clock was appointed as the time for a delivery. By way of explanation, and as having a bearing upon other items of evidence in the cause, it is proper to say that the defendant's testimony in denial of the fact of the agreement tends to the point that the proposed purchase by him was not in his individual capacity, but as the representative of the Stormont Silver Mining Company, of which he was one of the trustees, and was made conditional on his procuring the assent thereto of the other trustees. We assume, however, in the further consideration of the case, that the jury were warranted in finding the fact of a verbal agreement of sale as alleged by the plaintiff. The question as thus narrowed is whether there was sufficient evidence, to submit to the jury, of a receipt and acceptance by the defendant of the securities sold.

It appears that on July 8, 1882, in pursuance of the appointment made the day previously, the plaintiff handed the securities in question, at the office of the Stormont Silver Mining Company in New York, to Schuyler Van Rensselaer, who was the treasurer of that company, and took from him the following receipt:

"Office of Stormont Silver Mining Company,
No. 2 Nassau, cor. of Wall Street,
New York, July 8, 1882.
President: William S. Clark.
Secretary: John R. Bothwell.

Received of Dr. Rufus P. Lincoln the following certificates of stock on behalf of C. S. Hinchman, and to be delivered to him when he fulfills his contract with Dr. Lincoln to purchase said stocks for $18,000 for 28,400	shares	Stormont Silver M'g Co.

24,300	"	San Bruno Copper M'g Co
800	"	Eagle Silver M'g Co.
500	"	Hite Gold Quartz M'g Co.
1,819	"	Star Grove Silver M'g Co.
1,410	"	Menlo Gold Quartz Co., & order on Wells, Fargo & Co. for 45,000 shares.
600	"	Satemo Gold Quartz Co.
100	"	N. Y. & Sea Beach R. R. Co.

Also $9,500 in first mortgage bonds of the Battle Mn. & Lewis R. R. Co.

Schuyler Van Rensselaer.
Witness: M. W. Tyler."

The defendant was not present. The receipt, signed by Van Rensselaer, and which he gave to the plaintiff, was witnessed by M. W. Tyler, the plaintiff's attorney, and had been prepared by him. The securities mentioned therein are the same with those described in the complaint. For the purpose of proving the authority of Van Rensselaer to receive and receipt for the securities, some correspondence between the parties was put in evidence by the plaintiff, the material parts of which are as follows:

On July 21, 1882, Tyler, as attorney for the plaintiff, wrote to the defendant as follows:

"I was much disappointed in receiving your letter this afternoon, postponing your appointment with me in re Lincoln negotiation. When Dr. Lincoln accepted your offer of $18,000 for his position in reference to the Bothwell securities, he did so unqualifiedly, without even suggesting a modification of your offer, in the hope that in this way he would expedite a conclusion of the matter, and believing that nothing was open except the delivery of the securities, and the receipt of the price. This was on July 7th. On July 8th, learning from Mr. Van Rensselaer that you had left word with him to receive the securities, Dr. L. called on Mr. Van R. and left with him the securities just as he received them. Now, under these circumstances, Dr. L. feels as if there was nothing left to be done except the payment of the money, and that ought not to take very long. Now, I will do anything to accommodate you in this matter in the way of an appointment. If it is inconvenient for you to see me in New York, if you will appoint an early day I will meet you in Philadelphia. If you desire anything in particular should be signed or done by Dr. Lincoln in addition to what he has done already in delivering the securities to Mr. Van R., if you will write me what you request, I will prepare it and take it on with me for delivery to you."

On the same day the plaintiff wrote to the defendant as follows:

"Agreeable to a note from Col. Tyler, I went down this P. M., to meet you as per appointment and receive payment for Stormont and other stocks in accordance with your offer. I was especially disappointed, for I had promised to apply this money this week to cancel that which I borrowed when I took up the the stock. I hope nothing will prevent your carrying out our arrangement by Monday or Tuesday at the furthest, and I will esteem it a favor if, on receipt of this, you will telegraph me when I shall receive a check for the amount of the consideration."

In answer to this, the defendant wrote to the plaintiff from Philadelphia, July 22, 1882, as follows:

"Dear Sir: Your favor of the 21st, as well as Mr. Tyler's, duly received. I did not understand that the negotiation between us was finally concluded, but, as I explained to Mr. Tyler, there were some other questions which would have to be settled before I could act in the matter on account of my being a trustee. I told Mr. Van Rensselaer that he could receive the Stormont stock, held by you for joint account of yourself and Stormont, without requiring you to advance any more money, and that I would arrange with you about it; and he, knowing that I was in negotiation with you, took charge of the whole as handed to him by Mr. Tyler, your counsel. There are several questions which come up in regard to it, and I cannot give you any definite reply until I have conferred with counsel and my cotrustees on the subject. My advice to you is to exchange the Stormont stock for receipts, as a majority have already done, on receipt of this; and if you do so and not convenient for you to advance the contribution for additional stock, I will see that it is carried until we have an opportunity to fix up the whole matter."

It is further in evidence that, a short time after the date of Van Rensselaer's receipt, it was seen by the defendant, but he said or did nothing to repudiate it. Tyler also testifies that on July 20, 1882, he met the defendant, and had this conversation with him:

"I said to Mr. Hinchman that I had been looking for him for several days, and that I supposed he knew we had delivered the securities—the Bothwell securities—to Mr. Van Rensselaer, as he had directed; and he said, 'Yes, that was all right;' and I said, 'Well, now, when will you be able to close this matter?' 'Well,' he says, 'I am in a great hurry this morning, but I will come to your office certainly this afternoon or tomorrow afternoon, at 3 o'clock. You can rely upon my coming and seeing you upon one or the other of those days.' "

The plaintiff also testified that he had an accidental meeting with the defendant at Long Beach about the first of August, 1882. The defendant was in company with his attorney, Mr. Meyer. The interview is stated by the plaintiff as a witness as follows:

"I spoke to him. I do not know that he recognized me, for I was not well acquainted with him before, and he introduced me to Mr. Meyer, and he said, 'This is Dr. Lincoln, from whom I have the Bothwell securities;' and we had some conversation about it, but nothing very definite, although there came up during the conversation a statement that there was some controversy about it. I don't know whether I made the statement, or Mr. Meyer, or Mr. Hinchman. I remarked that there might be some difference—had heard something about some difference—of opinion about it, but that I had none; and I told Mr. Meyer that the idea of turning them over to the Stormont company was an afterthought of Mr. Hinchman; that I conceded nothing of the kind. I never had."

The following letter also is in evidence:

"Office of Stormont Mining Company of Utah,
No. 2 Nassau, cor. of Wall St.,
President: Charles S. Hinchman.
Secretary and Treasurer:
Schuyler Van Rensselaer.
NEW YORK, Aug. 24, 1882.

Schuyler Van Rensselaer, Esq.,
Sec'y and Treas. Stormont S. M. Co.,
No. 2 Nassau St., N. Y.

Dear Sir: Dr. Lincoln, through his attorney, Col. M. W. Tyler, having seen fit to disavow the understanding and agreement by which he obtained 'his position' in carrying the J. R. Bothwell securities in your hands left there by Col. Tyler, after conference with a majority of our trustees, I am instructed to notify you to retain possession of said securities until a court of competent jurisdiction shall direct you what to do with them, I claiming, as trustee, for the benefit of Stormont treasury, an equitable and bona fide interest therein. Please acknowledge safe receipt. Yours Truly,

Chas. S. Hinchman,
Prest. and Trustee S. S. M. Co."

There was some other correspondence between the parties not material to the present point, but nothing further was done until November 16, 1882, when a written demand was made by the plaintiff upon Van Rensselaer for the return of the securities. This demand was read in evidence on the part of the plaintiff. The following is a copy of it:

"To Schuyler Van Rensselaer:

As Mr. Charles S. Hinchman refuses to fulfill his contract with Dr. Lincoln to purchase certain securities delivered to you on the 8th day of July, 1882, for Mr. Hinchman, I hereby demand the immediate return of the securities to me, to wit, certificates for 28,400	shares	of the	Stormont Co's stock, or its equivalent.

24,300	"	"	San Bruno Mining Co's stock.
800	"	"	Eagle Silver " "
500	"	"	Hite Gold Quartz " "
1,819	"	"	Star Grove Silver " "
46,410	"	"	Menlo Gold Quartz Co's "
600	"	"	Satemo " " "
100	"	"	N. Y. & Sea Beach R. R. Co's stock.

$9,500 in first mortgage bonds of the Battle Mountain & Lewis R. R. Co.

Dated New York, November 16, 1882.

Yours, etc., Rufus P. Lincoln,
By M. W. Tyler, Atty."

The reply to it by Van Rensselaer, as proven, is as follows:

"New York, November 20, 1882.

Sir: In answer to the demand made upon me through Mr. M. W. Tyler, I beg to say that I hold the securities mentioned therein on behalf of yourself and Mr. C. S. Hinchman, and I have no interest in or claim upon them personally. I have been notified by Mr. Hinchman not to deliver them to you, and for that reason shall not be able to accede to your demand. Any arrangement agreed to by yourself and Mr. Hinchman shall have my prompt acquiescence. I am, etc., etc.,

Nothing further occurred until the bringing of this suit on November 25, 1882.

It is conceded by the counsel for the plaintiff that the delivery of the securities in question by the plaintiff to Van Rensselaer was according to the terms of the receipt taken from him at the time, and of itself was not sufficient evidence of a receipt and acceptance by the defendant to satisfy the Statute of Frauds. The jury were so instructed by the court. In speaking of it in his charge, the judge said:

"You will recollect that it recites that the property was to be delivered to Mr. Hinchman (I will simply state the language in substance) 'when he had performed his contract with Mr. Lincoln;' in other words, it attached a condition. If you find upon the evidence that that was all there was of this transaction, I think it my duty to say as matter of law that there was not such delivery as would take the case out of the Statute; because, if that were true, if he simply delivered the stock to Mr. Van Rensselaer, to be delivered to Mr. Hinchman, upon the payment of the sum by Mr. Hinchman, it would not be a receipt and acceptance by him, the possession would not be in him, he could exercise no dominion over it until he had performed the act which it was necessary for him to perform in order to obtain the title.

"To put it more plainly, perhaps the plaintiff would have in that event made Mr. Van Rensselaer his agent as well as the agent of the defendant."

The position of the plaintiff's counsel on this part of the case is stated by him in a printed brief, as follows:

"That receipt was put in evidence not as conclusive of a delivery to Hinchman, but as a fact to be taken into consideration, after the jury had determined the question of defendant's capacity, in connection with his admission that he had given Van Rensselaer some authority in the premises; his admission to Tyler after he saw the receipt that the delivery to Van Rensselaer was "all right;" his admission at Long Beach that he had the securities, and his direction to Van Rensselaer on August 24 not to surrender any of the securities. If the jury should find, as it actually did find, that Hinchman was acting in his individual capacity, and that his claim of a representative capacity, first intimated in his letter of July 22, was an afterthought and false, then the authority given by him to Van Rensselaer was not the limited authority he said it was, and in view of the admission to Tyler that the delivery was "all right," the admission at Long Beach of possession, and the subsequent assertion of dominion over the securities, it was a fair inference for the jury that Van Rensselaer's authority was a general one to receive the securities for Hinchman. If the jury should so find, then, under the terms of the receipt, the delivery to Van Rensselaer was a delivery to Hinchman and an acceptance by him sufficient to satisfy the statute, for nothing remained but for him to pay the purchase price."

In dealing with the question arising on this record we keep in view the general rule that it is a question for the jury whether, under all the circumstances, the acts which the buyer does or forbears to do amount to a receipt and acceptance within the terms of the Statute of Frauds. Bushel v. Wheeler, 15 Q. B. 442; Morton v. Tibbett, 15 Q. B. 428; Borrowscale v. Bosworth, 99 Mass. 381; Wartman v. Breed, 117 Mass. 18. But where the facts in relation to a contract of sale alleged to be within the Statute of Frauds are not in dispute, it belongs to the court to determine their legal effect. Shepherd v. Pressey, 32 N. H. 56. And so it is for the court to withhold the facts from the jury when they are not such as can in law warrant finding an acceptance, and this includes cases where, though the court might admit that there was a scintilla of evidence tending to show an acceptance, they would still feel bound to set aside a verdict finding an acceptance on that evidence. Browne, Stat. Frauds, § 321; Denny v. Williams, 5 Allen, 5; Howard v. Borden, 13 Allen, 299; Pinkham v. Mattox, 58 N. H. 604.

In order to take the contract out of the operation of the statute, it was said by the New York Court of Appeals in Marsh v. Rouse, 44 N. Y. 643, that there must be "acts of such a character as to place the property unequivocally within the power and under the exclusive dominion of the buyer as absolute owner, discharged of all lien for the price." This is adopted in the text of Benjamin on Sales, § 179, Bennett's 4th Am. ed., as the language of the decisions in America. In Shindler v. Houston, 1 N. Y. 261, 49 Am. Dec. 316. Gardner, J., adopts the language of the court in Phillips v. Bistoli, 2 Barn. & C. 511, "That to satisfy the statute there must be a delivery by the vendor with an intention of vesting the right of possession in the vendee, and there must be an actual acceptance by the latter with the intent of taking possession as owner." And adds: "This, I apprehend, is the correct rule, and it is obvious that it can only be satisfied by something done subsequent to the sale unequivocally indicating the mutual intentions of the parties. Mere words are not sufficient. Bailey v. Ogden, 3 Johns. 421, 3 Am. Dec. 509. * * * In a word, the statute of fraudulent conveyances and contracts pronounces these agreements, when made, void, unless the buyer should 'accept and receive some part of the goods.' The language is unequivocal, and demands the action of both parties, for acceptance implies delivery, and there can be no complete delivery without acceptance." In the same case Wright, J., said: "The acts of the parties must be of such a character as to unequivocally place the property within the power and under the exclusive dominion of the buyer. This is the doctrine of those cases that have carried the principle of constructive delivery to the utmost limit. * * * Where the acts of the buyer are equivocal, and do not lead irresistibly to the conclusion that there has been a transfer and acceptance of the possession, the cases qualify the inferences to be drawn from them, and hold the contract to be within the statute. * * * I think I may affirm with safety that the doctrine is now clearly settled that there must not only be a delivery by the seller, but an ultimate acceptance of the possession of the goods by the buyer, and that this delivery and acceptance can only be evinced by unequivocal acts independent of the proof of the contract."

This case is regarded as a leading authority on the subject in the State of New York, and has been uniformly followed there, and is recognized and supported by the decisions of the highest courts in many other States, as will appear from the note to the case as reported in 49 Am. Dec. 816, where a large number of them are collected. So in Remick v. Sandford, 120 Mass. 309, 316, it was said by Devens, J., speaking of the distinction between an acceptance which would satisfy the statute and an acceptance which would show that the goods corresponded with the warranty of the contract, that "If the buyer accepts the goods as those which he purchased, he may afterwards reject them if they were not what they were warranted to be, but the statute is satisfied. But while such an acceptance satisfies the statute, in order to have that effect it must be by some unequivocal act done on the part of the buyer with intent to take possession of the goods as owner. The sale must be perfected, and this is to be shown, not by proof of a change of possession only, but of such change with such intent. When it is thus definitely established that the relation of vendor and vendee exists, written evidence of the contract is dispensed with, although the buyer, when the sale is with warranty, may still retain his right to reject the goods if they do not correspond with the warranty. That there has been an acceptance of this character, or that the buyer has conducted himself, in regard to the goods, as owner is to be proved by the party setting up the contract."

Mr. Benjamin, in his treatise on Sales, § 187, says: "It will already have been perceived that in many of the cases, the test for determining whether there has been an actual receipt by the purchaser, has been to inquire whether the vendor has lost his lien. Receipt implies delivery, and it is plain that so long as vendor has not delivered, there can be no actual receipt by vendee. The subject was placed in a very clear light by Holroyd, J, in his decision in Baldey v. Parker, 2 Barn. & C., 37: 'Upon a sale of specific goods for a specific price, by parting with the possession, the seller parts with his lien. The statute contemplates such a parting with the possession, and, therefore, as long as the seller preserves his control over the goods so as to retain his lien, he prevents the vendee from accepting and receiving them as his own, within the meaning of the statute.' No exception is known in the whole series of decisions to the proposition here enunciated, and it is safe to assume as a general rule, that whenever no fact has been proven showing an abandonment by the vendor of his lien, no actual receipt by the purchaser has taken place. This has been as strongly insisted on in the latest as in the earliest cases. The principal decisions to this effect are referred to in the note."

In accordance with this, the rule is stated in Browne on The Statute of Frauds, par. 317*a*, as follows: "Where, by the terms of the contract, the sale is to be for cash, or any other condition precedent to the buyer's acquiring title in the goods be imposed, or the goods be at the time of the alleged receipt not fitted for delivery according to the contract, or anything remain to be done by the seller to perfect the delivery, such fact will be generally conclusive that there was no receipt by the buyer. There must be first a delivery by the seller with intent to give possession of the goods to the buyer."

It is clear, and, as we have seen, is conceded, that the original delivery by the plaintiff to Van Rensselaer of the securities, according to the terms of the receipt taken at the time, was not a delivery to the defendant in the sense of the rule established by the authorities, and that consequently there was not and could not have been at that time a receipt and acceptance of them by the defendant to satisfy the Statute of Frauds. How far can it be claimed that that inchoate and incomplete delivery was made perfect by any subsequent act or conduct of the parties?

The first circumstance relied on by the plaintiff as material to that point is that, shortly after the receipt was given, the defendant was informed of it and made no objection to it; but certainly this is insignificant. It added nothing to the transaction stated in the receipt that the defendant assented to it. That assent was simply that the securities had been delivered to Van Rensselaer to be delivered to him when paid for. It did not alter the implied contract between Van Rensselaer and the plaintiff arising upon the the terms of the receipt that the subject of the sale should not be delivered to the defendant until he had paid the agreed price.

The next circumstance relied upon is the conversation testified to by Tyler as having taken place on July 20 between him and the defendant. In that conversation Tyler testifies that he said to the defendant that "I supposed he knew we had delivered the securities—the Bothwell securities—to Van Rensselaer as he had directed, and he said, 'Yes, that was all right.'" Here certainly nothing was added to the transaction.

Both these circumstances are also fully met by the well established rule that mere words are not sufficient to constitute a delivery and acceptance which will take a verbal contract of sale out of the Statute of Frauds. Shindler v. Houston, ubi supra.

The next item of evidence in support of the plaintiff's contention is the conversation on August 1, 1882, at Long Beach, between the defendant and the plaintiff, in which the defendant, introducing Meyer to the plaintiff, said: "This is Doctor Lincoln, from whom I have the Bothwell securities." This declaration of the defendant is treated in the argument as an admission by him distinctly of the fact that he had at that time possession of the securities in question, which he could only have by a delivery from Van Rensselaer, either actual or constructive. This construction of the statement, however, in our opinion, is entirely inadmissible. The context plainly shows such not to have been its meaning, for, as appears by the testimony of the plaintiff relating it, the conversation immediately turned to the controversy between the parties as to whether the defendant had been negotiating for the securities in his individual capacity or as trustee for the Stormont Silver Mining Company. The expression testified to cannot fairly be extended beyond a casual reference to the transaction as it had taken place, and as it then stood upon the terms of the Van Rensselaer receipt. There is nothing whatever in the conversation to justify the inference that there had been a subsequent delivery by Van Rensselaer to the defendant, whereby the possession of the securities had been changed, or whereby the control and dominion over them had been given to the defendant by Van Rensselaer, contrary to the terms of his agreement with the plaintiff as contained in the receipt.

And such was and must have been the understanding of the plaintiff himself, for subsequently, on the 16th of November, he made the written demand upon Van Rensselaer for the immediate return of the securities to him on the ground that up to that time the defendant had refused to fulfill his contract for their purchase. This is certainly an unequivocal act on the part of the plaintiff, entirely inconsistent with the assertion that there had been, prior to that time, any delivery by him or by his authority, to the defendant, of the subject of the alleged sale. Its legal effect goes beyond that; it was a distinct rescission of the contract of sale; it was a notice to Van Rensselaer not to deliver to the defendant thereafter, even if he should offer to complete the contract by payment of the consideration; it put an end, by its own terms, to the relation between the parties of vendor and vendee; it made it unlawful in Van Rensselaer thereafter to deal with the securities, except by a return of them to the plaintiff as their owner. The refusal of Van Rensselaer to comply with the terms of the demand subjected him to an immediate action by the plaintiff for the recovery specifically if he could reach them by process, or otherwise, for damages for their conversion. This certainly is conclusive of the question of a prior delivery to the defendant, and a receipt and acceptance by him. Taylor v. Wakefield, 6 El. & Bl. 765; Benjamin on Sales, par. 171.

To meet this view, however, the letter of the defendant to Van Rensselaer on August 24 is relied on as evidence of a receipt and acceptance by the defendant at that time, being, as it is argued, the exercise of control and dominion over the securities by the defendant as owner. That letter, it will be observed, is addressed to Van Rensselaer as secretary and treasurer of the Stormont Silver Mining Company by the defendant, signing himself president and trustee of the same. It declares that the plaintiff had seen fit to disavow the understanding and agreement by which, as claimed by the defendant, he had obtained control of the securities in question which had been left in Van Rensselaer's hands; that after conference with a majority of the trustees of the company he had been instructed to notify Van Rensselaer to retain possession of them until a court of competent jurisdiction should direct him what to do with them, adding, "I claiming as a trustee, for the benefit of Stormont treasury, an equitable and bona fide interest therein." Clearly there is nothing in the sending of this document or in its contents which can have the effect contended for, whether considered alone or in connection with the subsequent refusal of Van Rensselaer to return the securities to the plaintiff in pursuance of his demand. Taken together, they do not constitute either the assertion or exercise of any right in respect to the securities under any contract of sale between the plaintiff and the defendant as individuals.

It is quite true, and the authorities so declare, that the receipt and acceptance by the vendee under a verbal agreement, otherwise void by the Statute of Frauds, may be complete, although the terms of the contract are in dispute. Receipt and acceptance by some unequivocal act, sufficiently proven to have taken place under some contract of sale, is sufficient to take the case out of the prohibition of the statute, leaving the jury to ascertain and find from the testimony what terms of sale were actually agreed on. Marsh v. Hyde, 3 Gray, 331; Townsend v. Hargraves, 118 Mass. 325; Benjamin, Sales, par. 170. But, as was said by Williams, J., in Tomkinson v. Staight, 17 C. B. 697, the acceptance by the defendant must be in the quality of vendee. "The statute does not mean that the thing which is to dispense with the writing is to take the place of all the terms of the contract, but that the acceptance is to establish the broad fact of the relation of vendor and vendee." The act or acts relied on as constituting a receipt and acceptance, to satisfy the statute, must be such as definitely establish that the relation of vendor and vendee exists. Remick v. Sandford, 120 Mass. 309.

In the present case the notice of the defendant, as president and trustee of the Stormont Company, to Van Rensselaer to retain possession of the securities, and Van Rensselaer's refusal to return the securities to the plaintiff on his demand in consequence thereof, certainly are not facts which tend to establish the existing relation of vendor and vendee between the plaintiff and the defendant. The defendant in his notice makes no claim as such, and certainly no assent on the part of the plaintiff to his exercise of any such dominion is shown. It is clear beyond all controversy, so far as this record shows, that the plaintiff had never consented that Van Rensselaer should deliver the securities to the defendant except upon payment of the price; nor is there a particle of proof that Van Rensselaer has ever done so.

It is further and finally urged, however, by his counsel, that it was competent for the plaintiff to waive the condition of a previous payment of the consideration, and to authorize Van Rensselaer to deliver the securities to the defendant without performance of the contract on the part of the latter, and that the bringing of the present action was such a waiver. If, in point of fact, Van Rensselaer had transferred the manual possession of the securities to the defendant, or if, contrary to the terms of his original receipt, he had agreed with the defendant to hold the securities subject to his order as his agent, free from the conditions of the purchase, and as his absolute property, the plaintiff's assent to this new arrangement might be well implied from his bringing an action against the defendant to recover the consideration. But the premises on which this conclusion rests are not to be found in the present case. There was no transfer of possession from Van Rensselaer to the defendant, nor has there been any change in the relation of Van Rensselaer to his possession of the securities, whereby he has agreed, with the consent of the defendant, to hold them as agent for the latter as vendee under any contract of sale with the plaintiff.

On the whole, we are well satisfied that there was no evidence of a receipt and acceptance of the securities in question by the defendant to authorize a recovery against him upon the alleged contract of sale. It was error in the circuit court to refuse to charge the jury to that effect, as requested by the counsel for the defendant.

For that error the judgment is reversed and the cause remanded, with directions to grant a new trial.

WILLIS M. SHERWOOD.

Mode of transferring real estate—Nebraska law—certificate of register or receiver—effect of—evidences of title.

1. The question of the mode of transferring real estate is one peculiarly within the jurisdiction of the legislative power of the State in which the land lies, in cases where the title has passed from the Government of the United States, and is in controversy between private citizens.

2. Under section 429 of the Code of Nebraska, when a judgment or decree is rendered for a conveyance, release or acquittance, in any court of the State, and the parties against whom the judgment or decree is rendered do not comply therewith, within the time therein mentioned, such judgment or decree has the same operation and effect as if the conveyance, release or acquittance has been executed pursuant thereto.

3. A certificate of the register of the land office at Omaha of the location of a military land warrant, or a certificate of the receiver at the same place, acknowledging payment for the purchase of a lot of land, cannot be received in the Circuit Court of the United States as establishing the legal title in the holder of such certificate, notwithstanding section 411 of the Code of Civil Procedure of Nebraska.

4. The certificate only gives the holder of it an equitable right to demand a patent of the government; and until such patent is issued, the legal title remains in the United States.

5. It is for the United States to fix the dignity and character, in its own courts, of the evidences of title which issue from the government; and in such courts a recovery in ejectment can only be had upon the strict legal title; the courts of law do not enforce, in that manner, the equitable title, evidenced by such certificates.

Submitted Dec. 12, 1887. Decided Jan. 9, 1888.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Nebraska. Reversed in part and remanded, with instructions to render judgment against the plaintiff for part, and in his favor for the remainder, of the land.

Sherwood, plaintiff in the court below, recovered a judgment in an action of ejectment for several tracts of land; from which judgment the defendants below brought a writ of error to this court.

The facts of the case are stated in the opinion.

Mr. J. M. Woolworth, for plaintiffs in error:

The certificates of the register and receiver of the local land office were incompetent to show title in the plaintiff below.

Bagnell v. Broderick, 38 U. S. 13 Pet. 436 (10: 235); Penn v. Holme, 62 U. S. 21 How. 481 (16: 198); Bennett v. Butterworth, 52 U. S. 11 How. 669 (13: 859); Hooper v. Scheimer, 64 U. S. 23 How. 235 (16: 452); Clagett v. Kilbourne, 66 U. S. 1 Black, 346 (17: 213). See also Foster v. Mora, 98 U. S. 425 (25: 191), and Simmons v. Ogle, 105 U. S. 271 (26: 1087).

The decree of the Circuit Court for Nebraska was also incompetent for the same purpose.

Hickey v. Stewart, 44 U. S. 3 How. 750 (11: 814).

Mr. John M. Thurston, for defendant in error:

The decree perfected the legal title in Willis M. Sherwood.

Hickey v. Stewart, 44 U. S. 3 How. 750 (11: 814).

The record of a judgment constitutes a perfect link in a chain of title, and can be introduced in an action of law to prove title.

Freeman, Judgments, 2d ed. §§ 416, 420; Fowler v. Savage, 3 Conn. 90.

Mr. Justice Miller delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a writ of error to the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Nebraska.

The defendant in error brought in that court a suit in the nature of an action of ejectment to recover several tracts or parcels of land then in the possession of the plaintiffs in error. The case was first tried before a jury, and the verdict afterwards set aside. By a written agreement of the parties, it was then submitted to the court without a jury. That court made a general finding in favor of the plaintiff, Sherwood, and certain special findings, and upon both of these rendered a judgment for him, for all the land claimed in his petition. A bill of exceptions was taken, which related to the introduction of evidence and the findings of the court. On this bill of exceptions and the special findings of fact the plaintiffs here assign two principal errors.

The first one of these, which affects all the land embraced in the suit, has reference to the introduction and effect of a decree in chancery, rendered in the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Nebraska, April 9, 1883, in which Sherwood was complainant and the Sauntee Land and Ferry Company was defendant. The plaintiff in the action of ejectment, having given evidence which he asserted showed title to all the land in controversy in the Sauntee Land and Ferry Company, introduced the record of this suit in chancery to establish a transfer of the title by means of the proceedings in that suit from that company to himself. The bill of complaint set out that this company, while owner of the land, had made a verbal agreement with William A. Gwyer that the latter should take, have, and hold the real estate mentioned, as his own property, and as consideration for the same should pay off, settle, and discharge the indebtedness of the company.

The decree of the court established the fact that Sherwood had acquired the interest of Gwyer in the property, whereby he became the equitable owner of it all, and that he was entitled to have a conveyance of the legal title from the Sauntee Land and Ferry Company. The decree then proceeded in the following language:

"It is further ordered and decreed that the respondent, the Sauntee Land and Ferry Company, shall, within twenty days after the entry of this decree, execute, acknowledge, prove and record, in the manner provided by law, a good and sufficient deed of conveyance to the complainant of all said real estate, to vest the entire legal title thereof in the respondent, and to deliver said deed of conveyance, so executed, acknowledged, proved and recorded, to the complainant.

"It is further ordered and decreed that in case said respondent shall fail, neglect, or refuse to make, execute, acknowledge, prove, record and deliver to the complainant such deed of conveyance within the time hereinbefore fixed, then and in that case this decree shall stand and be a good, sufficient and complete conveyance from the respondent, the Sauntee Land and Ferry Company, to the complainant, Willis M. Sherwood, of all the right, title, and estate of said respondent in and to said real estate, and shall be taken and held as good, complete, and perfect a deed of conveyance as would be the deed of conveyance hereinbefore specified; and that the respondent, and all persons claiming through, from, or under it, be, and they are hereby, perpetually barred, restrained, and enjoined from asserting any right, title, ownership, or interest in or to said real estate adversely to the complainant, and from in any manner interfering with the peaceable and quiet possession of complainant in and of the same."

No conveyance was ever made under this decree by that company, and it is objected that for this reason Sherwood did not acquire by that proceeding the strict legal title, but only obtained an equitable one, and the quieting of that title as against the Sauntee Land and Ferry Company. Section 429 of the Code of Nebraska is, however, relied upon by Sherwood's counsel as giving to the decree in his favor in the chancery suit the effect of an actual conveyance of the title. That section is as follows:

"When any judgment or decree shall be rendered for a conveyance, release, or acquittance in any court of this State, and the party or parties against whom the judgment or decree shall be rendered do not comply therewith within the time mentioned in said judgment or decree, such judgment or decree shall have the same operation and effect, and be as available, as if the conveyance, release, or acquittance had been executed conformable to such judgment or decree."

We are of opinion that if this section of the Code be valid, it was the intention of the makers of it that a judgment and decree, such as the one before us, should have the same effect, where the parties directed to make the conveyance fail to comply with the order, as it would have had if they had complied, in regard to the transfer of title from them to the party to whom they were bound to convey by the decree. The language of this section of the Code hardly admits of any other construction. When the party decreed to make the conveyance does not comply therewith within the time mentioned in the judgment or decree, such judgment or decree shall have the same effect and operation and be as available as if the conveyance had been executed. The operation or effect here meant was the transfer of title, and it could not have been made any clearer if it had said that it should have the effect of transferring the title from the party who fails to convey to the one to whom it ought to be conveyed. This must have been the meaning in the minds of the legislators.

It was undoubtedly the ancient and usual course in such a proceeding to compel the party who should convey to perform the decree of the court by fine and imprisonment for refusing to do so. But inasmuch as this was a troublesome and expensive mode of compelling the transfer, and the party might not be within reach of the process of the court so that he could be attached, it has long been the practice of many of the States, under statutes enacted for that purpose, to attain this object, either by the appointment of a special commissioner who should convey in the name of the party ordered to convey, or by statutes similar to the one under consideration, by which the judgment or decree of the court was made to stand as such conveyance on the failure of the party ordered to convey.

The validity of these statutes has never been questioned, so far as we know, though long in existence in nearly all the States of the Union. There can be no doubt of their efficacy in transferring the title, in the courts of the States which have enacted them; nor do we see any reason why the courts of the United States may not use this mode of effecting that which is clearly within their power.

The question of the mode of transferring real estate is one peculiarly within the jurisdiction of the legislative power of the State in which the land lies. As this court has repeatedly said, the mode of conveyance is subject to the control of the legislature of the State; and as the case in hand goes upon the proposition that the title had passed from the Government of the United States and was in controversy between private citizens, there can be no valid objection to this mode of enforcing the contract for conveyance between them according to the law of Nebraska. U. S. v. Crosby, 11 U. S. 7 Cranch, 115; [3: 287]; Clark v. Graham, 19 U. S. 6 Wheat. 577 [5: 334]; McCormick v. Sullivant, 23 U. S. 10 Wheat. 192 [6: 300]; U. S. v. Fox, 94 U. S. 315 [24: 192]; Brine v. Hartford F. Ins. Co. 96 U. S. 627 [24: 858]; Connecticut Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Cushman, 108 U. S. 51 [27: 648]. We cannot see, therefore, any error in the circuit court in permitting the proceedings in the chancery suit to be given in evidence, nor in giving to them the effect of transferring from the Sauntee Land and Ferry Company such legal title as it had to any of the property in controversy.

The plaintiff, in order to sustain his right of action in this suit, offered in evidence, first, a certificate of the register of the land office at Omaha, Nebraska, of the date of August 14, 1857, of the location by John Joseph Wright of a military land warrant upon the southwest quarter of the southwest quarter of section 28, and the west one half of the northwest quarter of section 33, in Township 13 North of Range ten East, containing 120 acres. He also offered the assignment of this land and the certificate to the Sauntee Land and Ferry Company. Another certificate of the receiver at Omaha, of the same date, was also offered, acknowledging the payment of $45.50 for the purchase of lot number 1 of quarter section number 33, in Township number 13, North of Range ten East, containing $86\frac{40}{100}$ acres, and an assignment thereof to the same company.

To both of these certificates and assignments the defendants objected, on the ground that they were immaterial and did not purport to be a conveyance of said lands, and that title could not be shown in this action of ejectment by a certificate of a register or receiver. In its findings, the court upon this subject finds specially that by virtue of these certificates "The said Wright became seised in fee of the said lands, and that by his deed of conveyance thereof the same passed to the Sauntee Land and Ferry Company."

It has been repeatedly decided by this court that such certificates of the officers of the land department do not convey the legal title of the land to the holder of the certificate, but that they only evidence an equitable title, which may afterwards be perfected by the issue of a patent, and that in the courts of the United States such certificates are not sufficient to authorize a recovery in an action of ejectment. The ground of these decisions is that in these courts, a recovery in ejectment can only be had upon the strict legal title; that this class of certificates presupposes the existence of the title in the United States at the time they were given; and that something more is necessary to show that this legal title was ever devested from the United States by a patent or otherwise. The decisions on this subject are quite numerous, and the principle on which they rest has been frequently asserted and maintained with uniformity.

In the case of Bagnell v. Broderick, 38 U. S. 13 Pet. 436 [10: 235], this question was very fully considered, and the language of the court, expressive of the result arrived at, is that "Congress has the sole power to declare the dignity and effect of titles emanating from the United States; and the whole legislation of the Federal Government, in reference to the public lands, declares the patent the superior and conclusive evidence of legal title; until its issuance the fee is in the government, which, by the patent, passes to the grantee; and he is entitled to recover the possession in ejectment."

Fenn v. Holme, 62 U. S. 21 How. 481 [16: 198], was also a case of this character, and in that the court said: "This is an attempt to assert at law, and by a legal remedy, a right to real property—an action of ejectment to establish the right of possession in land. That the plaintiff in ejectment must in all cases prove a legal title to the premises in himself, at the time of the demise laid in the declaration, and that evidence of an equitable estate will not be sufficient for a recovery, are principles so elementary and so familiar to the profession as to render unnecessary the citation of authority in support of them."

The case of Hooper v. Scheimer, 64 U. S. 23 How. 235 [16: 452], was an action of ejectment in the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Arkansas. The plaintiff endeavored to maintain his right to recover possession by the production of an entry made in the United States Land Office. A statute of Arkansas enacted that an action of ejectment may be maintained where the plaintiff claims possession by virtue of an entry made with the register or receiver of the proper Land Office. This court, however, after referring to the case of Bagnell v. Broderick, and declaring that its principles are the settled doctrine of the court, adds: "But there is another question standing in advance of the foregoing, to wit: Can an action of ejectment be maintained in the federal courts against a defendant in possession, on an entry made with the register and receiver?" To which question it responds by saying: "It is also the settled doctrine of this court that no action of ejectment will lie on such an equitable title, notwithstanding a State Legislature may have provided otherwise by statute. The law is only binding on the state courts, and has no force in the Circuit Courts of the Union." See also Foster v. Mora, 98 U. S. 425 [25: 191], for an assertion of the same principle.

The defendants in error rely upon section 411 of the Nebraska Code of Civil Procedure, which is analogous in its provisions to the Statute of Arkansas referred to in the case of Hooper v. Scheimer. That section is as follows: "The usual duplicate receipt of the receiver of any land office, or, if that be lost or destroyed, or beyond the reach of the party, the certificate of such receiver, that the books of his office show the sale of a tract of land to a certain individual, is proof of title equivalent to a patent, against all but the holder of an actual patent." But, whatever effect may be given to this statute in the Courts of the State of Nebraska, it is obvious that, in the Circuit Court of the United States, it cannot be received as establishing the legal title in the holder of such certificate. Where the question is one of a derivation of title from the United States, it is plain that this class of evidence implies that the title remains in the United States. The certificate is given for the purpose of vesting in the receiver of it an equitable right to demand the patent of the government after such further proceedings as the laws of the United States, and the course of business in the departments may require.

The circuit court cannot presume that a patent has been issued to the party to whom such certificate was issued, or to anyone to whom he may have transferred it. The fact of the issue of a patent is a matter of record in the Land Department of the United States, and a copy of that record may be so easily obtained by application at the proper office that no necessity exists for the acceptance in an action of law of the receipt of a register or receiver as a substitute for the patent. If it never issued, it is obvious that the legal title remains in the United States, and according to the well settled principles of the action of the ejectment the plaintiff cannot be entitled to recover in the action at law.

To receive this evidence, and to give to it the effect of proving a legal title in the holder of such a receipt, because the statute of the State proposes to give to it such an effect, is to violate the principle asserted in Bagnell v. Broderick, that it is for the United States to fix the dignity and character of the evidence of title which issue from the government. And it is also in violation of the other principle settled by the cited decisions, that in the courts of the United States a recovery in ejectment can be had alone upon the strict legal title, and that the courts of law do not enforce in that manner the equitable title evidenced by these certificates.

There was error, therefore, in the decision of the court admitting these certificates from the land office as evidence of title, and in the finding that there was such evidence of title in the plaintiff as justified the recovery. The judgment of the court on the facts found in regard to the remainder of the land is correct. It must, however, be reversed for the error in regard to the $156\frac{40}{100}$ acres included in the two certificates of the land office. It is, therefore, remanded with instructions to render judgment against the plaintiff for the $156\frac{40}{100}$ acres, and in his favor for the remainder of the land.

GEORGE R. C. FLOYD.

False representations of quantity of land—interpretation of contract—acts of the parties.

1. In an action to make defendant responsible for a deficiency in a quantity of land sold by him to plaintiff, where the question was whether defendant made representations in regard to the number of acres of the land which were intentionally false and made to deceive the plaintiff, held, upon the evidence, that defendant did not make any positive representations as to the quantity of the land nor any statements which he knew to be false or which were intended to deceive.

2. Held, also, that in the contract for the sale of the land the words "about 1000 acres of land" and the words "estimated to contain 1000 acres" in a subsequent contract of compromise, are to be construed with reference to the circumstances surrounding the parties which would probably influence them in making the contract at the time when it was entered into; and the contract being one for exchange of several tracts of land, some of which were incumbered by liens of judgments and decrees, without an agreed price per acre, that the contract is not to be construed by that strict rule in regard to quantity that might govern its interpretation if it were an independent purchase to be paid for in money.

3. Held further, that continued payments upon the land after the purchaser had ample opportunity to discover the deficiency in quantity, afford a presumption that the seller did not intend, by the language used, to warrant the quantity and that the purchaser did not understand him to do so, and that similar words used in the second contract showed that the estimate of quantity was simply conjectural, and that the seller was not under obligation to make good the difference between the amount of 1000 acres and the quantity found within the boundaries by actual survey.

APPEAL by defendant from a decree of the District Court of the United States for the District of West Virginia for damages for a deficiency in land sold by defendant to plaintiff. Reversed and remanded, with directions.

The facts and case are fully stated in the opinion.

Mr. James H. Ferguson, for appellant:

The contract of December 2, 1857, between Floyd and Lawson, was neither in law nor in fact a sale of the lands, by the one to the other, by the acre, but was a sale in gross; and it does not and cannot amount to a warranty of quantity.

Crislip v. Cain, 19 W. Va. 438; Ketchum v. Stout, 20 Ohio, 453.

Mr. Cornelius C. Watts, for appellee:

The contract specifying the quantity of the Logan land, with almost exact certainty, using the word about to show that it might be a little less or a little more, in the sense of "more or less," constituted a material element in the determination of the price.

Western Mining & Mfg. Co. v. Peytona Canal Coal Co. 8 W. Va. 437; Blessing v. Beatty, 1 Rob. (Va.) 302.

Mr. Justice Miller delivered the opinion of the court:

On the second day of December, 1857, George R. C. Floyd, the appellee in this case, and Anthony Lawson, the appellant, entered into a written agreement for the exchange of several tracts of land which were owned by Floyd for another tract of land owned by Lawson. These tracts were in different parts of the country, and those held by Floyd were incumbered by an indebtedness amounting to over $18,000, which Lawson assumed to pay. In adjusting the exchange of these tracts, those which were to be conveyed by Floyd to Lawson were estimated at $26,000, and the property which Lawson agreed to convey to Floyd at $10,000. The balance which by these estimates would be due from Floyd to Lawson, after Lawson had paid the incumbrances on the Floyd property, some two or three thousand dollars, was left a little uncertain by reason of the necessity of ascertaining the amounts due on some of the liens, and was to be paid by Floyd in cash.

The contract for this exchange, which is appended to the bill in this suit as Exhibit A, is as follows:

"Memorandum of an agreement, made this second day of December, 1857, between George R. C. Floyd, of the one part, and Anthony Lawson, of the other part, witnesseth: That the said Floyd has sold to the said Lawson, for twenty-six thousand dollars, two several tracts of land lying in the west end of Burke's Garden, in the County of Tazewell, one known as the Waterford Place, and supposed to contain eight hundred and two acres, and the other known as the Smith Place, adjoining the other, and supposed to contain four hundred and sixty-seven acres; the title to the Waterford Place is in John B. Floyd; and the said George R. C. Floyd binds himself to procure a deed therefor to the said Lawson, with general warranty and relinquishment of dower; and the title to the Smith Place is in one Ballard P. Smith, who will make a deed therefor, with general warranty and relinquishment of dower, upon the payment of the purchase money hereinafter named; and the said Floyd is to deliver possession of said tracts of land at once; and the said Lawson for the said tracts of land binds himself to pay as follows, viz.: to Ballard P. Smith the amount for which said Smith Place sold for under a decree of the Circuit Court of Washington County, which is supposed to be $8,410, but if that is not the correct sum, it is to be ascertained, and to pay to A. S. Gray the sum of $9,850, which may be paid in three installments of $3,283.33 each — one due January 1, 1859, one due January 1, 1860, and the other due January 1, 1861, each bearing interest from January 1, 1858—and also to convey to the said Floyd the property of said Lawson at Logan Court House, consisting of five half acre lots, viz.: Nos. 8, 9, 10, 11, and 12 in the original plan of the Town of Lawnsville, now Aracoma, and about 1,000 acres of land lying on the east side of Guyandotte and north of Aracoma, being all the lands owned by said Lawson below or north of Kezer's Branch, lying back of lots Nos. 6 and 7, and below the public square, and down as far as McDonald's land; and the said Lawson puts the property at ten thousand dollars, and the said Lawson is to make the said Floyd a deed, with general warranty and relinquishment of dower, to the above described property, except one recent grant and part of another tract lying back from the river, which he is only to convey specially; and the said Lawson is to deliver possession of the lands and lots by first March next, except the storehouse and dwelling-house, and of them by the first of May next; and whereas, the above payment to Gray and Smith, and the above property at $10,000, makes more than the sum of $26,000, which the two tracts of land in the garden are rated at, it is agreed that the difference, whatever it may be, between six thousand dollars and the sum necessary to be paid to Smith, shall be due from said Floyd to said Lawson, to be paid when said Lawson delivers possession of the lands, lots, etc., at Aracoma; and the said Lawson has the privilege of retaining the title to the land to be conveyed by him till the said balance is paid.

Each party took possession of the property which he acquired under this exchange, and Lawson paid the liens on the property which he received from Floyd and had the title conveyed to himself. The balance which was due from Floyd to Lawson remained unpaid for fourteen years, when Lawson brought suit in the Circuit Court of Logan County, West Virginia, to collect the debt by the enforcement of the lien which he held on the land—the title remaining in him up to this time.

It seems that Floyd had sold the whole or a large part of the property he received from Lawson to one Johnston, who was made a defendant to that suit. This action was compromised on the third day of August, 1871, by a written agreement of that date, signed by Lawson, Floyd and Johnston. This compromise recognized that there was due to Lawson from Floyd the sum of $5,051.30, which was a lien on the real estate described in the contract, and Johnston assumed and bound himself to pay to Lawson that sum in three installments, with 6 per cent interest; and it was agreed that the property and control of the land should be in Johnston as an indemnity to him for the payment of this purchase money. This agreement is marked Exhibit B in the bill, and is as follows:

"This contract, Made this third day of August, 1871, between Anthony Lawson, Geo. R. C. Floyd, and John W. Johnston, witnesseth: That whereas, a certain suit is pending in the Circuit Court of Logan County, West Virginia, in which Anthony Lawson is plaintiff, and said Floyd and Johnston and others defendants, touching a balance of purchase money claimed by said Lawson for a tract of land near Logan Court House: Now, therefore, The said suit is to be dismissed at the next term of the court, each party paying his own costs, and all matters in said suit are settled on the following terms, viz.: a note executed by A. Lawson to Geo. R. C. Floyd, which was filed by said Floyd as an offset against said Lawson in the said suit, is to be credited with the sum of two thousand seven hundred and sixty dollars, as of the date of June 30, 1858, being the amount, principal and interest, at that date, of the legacies given by the will of Mrs. Letitia Floyd to Letty P. Lewis and Mikattie P. Johnston, which legacies were paid by said Lawson, the said payments so made being hereby ratified by said Floyd; and it is further agreed that said Johnston shall assume, and he does hereby assume and bind himself, to pay to Anthony Lawson the balance of said purchase money, amounting, principal and interest, at this date, to $4,851.30, and the costs of said suit, estimated to be $200, making in all five thousand and fifty-one dollars and thirty cents, as follows, viz.: one third on or before the first day of January, 1873; one third on or before the first day of January, 1874, and one third on or before the first day of January, 1875, all bearing interest at 6 per cent per annum from this date; and it is further agreed that said Lawson and said Floyd shall each, and they do hereby, bind themselves that the property and the control of the tract of land herein mentioned, sold by the said Lawson to said Floyd, estimated to contain 1,000 acres, shall be in said Johnston as an indemnity to him, which is described as follows, viz.: all the land owned by said Lawson, lying below Kezer's Branch above Aracoma, lying back of the lots Nos. 5, 6 and 7, in the original plan of the Town of Lawnsville (now Aracoma), including the following town lots, as laid down in said plan of the Town of Lawnsville, viz.: Nos. 8, 9, 10, 11 and 12; thence down the river to box elders, at the lower end of said Lawson's land; thence with the division line between said Lawson's land and McDonald's land; thence up the point of the ridge below the sugar camp hollow to the back line of said Lawson's land; thence with the back line to said Kezer's Branch, and thence down the same to the beginning; but the said Lawson is to retain the legal title to said lands and lots as a security for the payment of the said purchase money, except the land and lots sold to Isaac Morgan and John and Urias Buskirk; and it is further agreed that said portions of said land as may be sold by said Johnston or his agent shall be conveyed by the said Lawson to the purchaser, upon the payment to him of the purchase money of the said portion; and the balance of the land, if any, not sold by the said Johnston or his agent to third parties, is to be conveyed by the said Lawson to the said Floyd when the said sum of $5,051.80 is paid, with its interest; and it is further agreed that the portions of land sold by Geo. R. C. Floyd to Isaac Morgan, being about fifty acres, at the lower end of the tract, and lots Nos. 11 and 12 in the original plan of the Town of Lawnsville, now Aracoma, lying between the river and the present street, and extending down to the lower corner of the stable, and thence to the river, sold to Urias Buskirk, shall be ratified, and the legal title shall be conveyed by said Lawson to the said Morgan and to the said Buskirk, respectively, or to such persons as they shall in writing direct, whenever requested to do so by said Floyd. And the said Lawson shall convey all the old patent lands with general warranty and the back lands with special warranty.

In October, 1877, the present bill in chancery was brought by Floyd, against Lawson and Johnston and divers persons who had purchased from Johnston parts of the land. The case being removed into the District Court of the United States for the District of West Virginia, various proceedings were had, all the parties answered, and the record presents considerable complexity and irregularity.

The purpose of Floyd's bill was to enjoin Johnston from making any further sales of the land, and to enjoin Lawson from any further enforcement of his claim for the sum recognized to be due by the agreement of 1871. He based the relief thus sought on the ground that the sale to him of the Lawson property was by a contract for a thousand acres of land, and that in the compromise agreement of 1871 this provision was repeated.

His contention is that by the language of the contract Lawson sold him 1,000 acres of land, which he is bound to make good; also, that in the conversations preliminary to the execution of that contract, Lawson represented to him that there was 1,000 acres in the tract which he was selling to him, and that he, Lawson, knew very well about how much land there was, while Floyd himself was utterly ignorant of the extent of the tract, and relied upon Lawson's statements upon that subject. He also alleges that these statements of Lawson were false and fraudulent, and intended to deceive him; that before bringing this suit he, the plaintiff, had an accurate survey made of the land according to the boundaries mentioned in the contract, and that, instead of there being 1,000 acres, as represented by Lawson, there were only 592 acres, leaving a deficiency of 408 acres. He claims that Lawson should be held to account for this deficiency, at the average value of $10,000 for the thousand, and that Lawson and Johnston had been selling off parts of the land, the purchase money on which went to Lawson to pay the amount supposed to be due to him. If deduction is made for the deficiency in quantity, he prays that Johnston and Lawson be held to account, and for such relief as may be just and right.

Lawson answers this bill by denying emphatically that the land was a sale by the acre, or that it was ever considered to be such; denies that the contract on its face is susceptible of any construction which binds him for the quantity of 1,000 acres, that he ever made any representations with regard to the quantity that was in the tracts which he sold, or that he knew anything more about the quantity within the boundaries mentioned in the contract than Floyd did, and denies any fraudulent purpose or intent. He says that the sale was an exchange of lands in the lump, and the phrase "about 1,000 acres of land lying on the east side of Guyandotte and north of Aracoma," and particularly described by its boundaries, was understood by both parties to be a conjectural estimate of the quantity contained therein, and neither a warranty nor a representation that there was that much land there. He also avers that the repetition of the description in the compromise agreement fourteen years afterwards, where it is said that the land "sold by said Lawson to said Floyd," the boundaries of which are given with more precision, is "estimated to contain 1,000 acres," cannot fairly be construed to be a warranty of sale of that many acres of land.

Testimony was taken on this subject, mainly consisting of that of Floyd and Lawson; and the court, after deciding that Lawson was bound to make good the quantity of 1,000 acres of land or account for the deficiency, had a resurvey made, in which it was ascertained that the amount of the deficit was 368 instead of 408 acres, for which the court decided Lawson to be responsible. The case was then referred to a master, who made two or three reports, which were excepted to, and then to another master to state the accounts between the parties, on the basis of the court's decision that Lawson should account for the quantity which was lacking. Further reports were made and exceptions taken, and reports filed after the decrees, in a very irregular manner. A final decree was rendered by the court in favor of Floyd and against Lawson for the sum of $5,046.40, with interest thereon from the first day of November, 1883, from which decree Lawson takes the present appeal.

It is proper to state that a cross bill was filed by Lawson, insisting upon his right to recover the sum found to be due in the compromise of 1871, and that it be held to be a lien on the property and enforced against it by decree of the court.

The principal contest, and indeed the only one, necessary to be decided in this court is whether Lawson should be held responsible for the 868 acres which the land he put into the exchange with Floyd fell short of the amount of 1,000 acres; for it does not seem to be disputed that upon an actual survey of the boundaries according to the contract there was that much less than that quantity within its area. The question of this responsibility of Lawson presents itself in two aspects:

First, whether, apart from the written contract of 1857, and at or about the time it was made, Lawson made representations in regard to the number of acres within the boundaries of the tract which he was selling, under circumstances that authorized Floyd to rely upon them as true, and that these representations were either intentionally false and made to deceive or were in fact untrue and known to Lawson to be so;

Second, whether, upon a fair construction of the contract, it is an agreement to sell and convey 1,000 acres of land for the sum of $10,000, or whether it is a contract to convey the tract of land described in the agreement, which was supposed by the parties to contain about 1,000 acres, without any obligation on the part of Lawson that there should be that much.

It would serve no profitable purpose to go over the testimony concerning representations or statements made by Lawson at the time of the making of the original contract, or at the time the compromise of 1871 was entered into, with regard to the quantity of land in the tract. The evidence is almost exclusively that of Floyd and Lawson, and it will be sufficient for the purposes of this decision to say that it does not leave upon us the impression that Lawson made any positive representations as to the quantity of land within the boundaries described, and especially as to the tract containing 1,000 acres, much less any statements on that subject which were intended to deceive, and which he knew to be false or untrue.

Johnston, who was a brother-in-law of Floyd, as he states, and a lawyer, and who drew the compromise agreement of 1871, was introduced as a witness in the case. He says that he does not recollect hearing Mr. Lawson make any statement or representation to Mr. Floyd at that time about the land. He then says:

"I wrote the contract, Messrs. Floyd and Lawson sitting at the table. When I came to that part of the contract where I had to describe the number of acres I asked the question, addressed to both of them, how many acres there were. Mr. Floyd said, 'A thousand.' Mr. Lawson said, 'No; I won't be bound to any particular number of acres; there are several tracts, and I dont know how they would run out.' Then I used the language contained in the contract describing the land, which seemed to be satisfactory to them both."

It is not easy to resist the conclusion that at this moment, when they were compromising a troublesome lawsuit, the fag end of the controversy about all these lands, and the writing embracing that compromise was being drawn up for both of them to sign, and when the scribe put to them both the questions as to the number of acres to be inserted in this description, their attention must have been called to that matter as one of importance, if either of them looked upon the number of acres as an essential part of the contract. And when Floyd suggested the words "a thousand," and Mr. Lawson said "No; I won't be bound to any particular number of acres; there are several tracts, and I don't know how they would run out," and Floyd made no objection to that statement, but consented to the use of the words "estimated to contain 1,000 acres," the evidence seems to us satisfactory that, at least at that time, it was not considered that Lawson was bound for the 1,000 acres, or for any particular quantity of land.

As regards the question of law arising on the construction of the words "about 1,000 acres of land" in the original contract, and especially the similar expression used in the compromise agreement; if there was nothing but the language to be looked to, it must be confessed that under the state of the authorities on that subject it would not be very easy to arrive at a conclusion entirely satisfactory. But in a case of this kind it is eminently proper to consider the circumstances surrounding the parties, and which would probably influence them in making the contract, at the time it was entered into. These, we think, throw much light on the question in this case, and leave but little doubt that it was not intended to bind Lawson to any particular number of acres in the transfer which he made to Floyd, but that the transaction was an exchange of different tracts of land between the parties to the contract, the parcels belonging to each of them being estimated in the lump or indicated by the boundaries and descriptions given in the instruments.

The case is not that of a purchase, standing alone, of a tract of land by one person from another, which is to be paid for by a particular sum of money. It is a case of an exchange of several tracts of land between the parties. This was a governing element in the transaction. The consideration received by Lawson for the land which he was to convey to Floyd was not $10,000 in money, but two distinct pieces of land described by the names of the places, to which Floyd agreed to give him a good title.

It is obvious that the parties in making this exchange also had reference to the further circumstance that Lawson would have to pay out over $18,000, to relieve the land he was to receive from Floyd from liens, a part of which were in judgments or decrees. The contract, then, is not to be construed by that strict rule in regard to the quantity of land which Lawson was to convey to Floyd that might govern its interpretation if it were an independent purchase to be paid for in money.

In the description of the land that Floyd sold to Lawson it is described as "two several tracts of land, lying in the west end of Burke's Garden, in the County of Tazewell, one known as the Waterford Place and supposed to contain 802 acres, and the other known as the Smith Place, adjoining the other, and supposed to contain 467 acres." The value of these parcels was estimated at $26,000. There is also an uncertainty in the suggestion as to the amount of liens on these lands. It was "supposed to be $8,410" as to one tract, and $9,850 as to the other. It is in accordance with this loose and general way of describing these lands that the phrase "about 1,000 acres of land" is used in the original contract in regard to that belonging to Lawson.

After the statement of the agreement of Lawson to pay the liens on the lands conveyed to him by Floyd, the contract proceeds: "And also to convey to the said Floyd the property of said Lawson at Logan Court House, consisting of five half acre lots, viz.: Nos. 8, 9, 10, 11 and 12 in the original plan of the Town of Lawnsville, now Aracoma, and about 1,000 acres of land lying on the east side of Guyandotte and north of Aracoma; being all the lands owned by said Lawson below or north of Kezer's Branch, lying back of lots Nos. 6 and 7 and below the public square, and down as far as McDonald's land; and the said Lawson puts the property at $10,000."

It is not easy to see that, under the circumstances of this exchange of property, either party was binding himself by this loose language to a definite number of acres in the land which he was conveying to the other; and it seems probable that the sum of $26,000, said to be the value of the Floyd land, and $10,000, the value at which the tract of Lawson was put, was conventional, and adopted as a mode of adjusting the terms of the exchange, and was not intended or supposed by either party to be the actual value of the property so described.

It will be observed, also, that the description of the lands to be conveyed by Lawson is, "all the lands owned by said Lawson" in that place with a sufficient designation of the locality to enable anybody to find out where it is. It is also evident that a small part of this land was bottom land, lying on the Guyandotte River and near the town, and therefore of considerable value, while the larger part of it ran up on to the mountain ridges. In accordance with this understanding, the original contract states that "Lawson is to make the said Floyd a deed, with general warranty and relinquishment of dower, to the above described property, except one recent grant and part of another tract lying back from the river, which he is only to convey specially;" thus showing the difference in value attached to different parts of the land.

In the description found in the articles of compromise, which were made fourteen years after Floyd had obtained possession and control of the parcels allotted to him, and after legal proceedings to collect the purchase money, they seem to have made a more definite description of the land by metes and bounds and by corners and objects than was made in the original contract; and according to the statement of the conversation which took place at that time, as testified to by Johnston, it is fair to suppose that this more definite description was intended to stand as the only means of ascertaining what was sold, leaving no obligation as to the particular quantity of land that might be found within its limits.

It is also to be noted that in addition to the time which had elapsed while the property was under Floyd's control and possession, between the time of the original sale and the compromise of 1871, seven years more passed during which he was selling off portions of it to raise money to pay Lawson, and that during all this time he made no complaint of any deficiency in the quantity, nor of any other fault which he found in regard to the property received by him from Lawson. It is true that this consideration is not conclusive, as the contract still remained an executory one, the title remaining in Lawson as security for the unpaid purchase money; but it affords a strong presumption that with such a large deficit Floyd had ample opportunity to discover that there was only about two thirds of the quantity which he claimed to have purchased, and that if he had understood the contract as obliging Lawson to convey or make good to him the full amount of one thousand acres of land he would long before have ceased to pay Lawson that which he did not owe him, under the construction of the contract which he now asserts, and would not have submitted to a forced sale of the property by Johnston to raise money for that purpose.

Nor do we think it unimportant to consider that this compromise agreement of 1871, made fourteen years after Floyd was in the full possession and actual control of the land, and executed in an adjustment of the suit for the very purchase money, which Floyd now seeks to recover back, must have been made with a fair knowledge of the location, boundaries and description of the land in controversy, and that it was determined at that time to describe it with more particularity as to metes and bounds, and to reject a phrase by which Lawson might have been bound for 1,000 acres, substituting in its place an expression which left it in the form of a conjectural estimate of the quantity therein contained.

Under all these circumstances we are of opinion that Lawson is under no obligation to make good the difference between the amount of 1,000 acres and the quantity found within the boundaries by actual survey. The decree of the court, based upon the erroneous idea that he should be held so accountable, must therefore be reversed.

As this error pervades all the accounting, and all the reports of the referees to state the accounts between the parties, it is not possible for this court to make a correct accounting and state what the decree should be, taking into consideration the cross bill and the original bill. The case is, therefore, remanded to the District Court, with directions to take an accounting on the principles here established, and to render a decree accordingly.

Stipulation of discontinuance, effect of.

Where parties to a suit pending in this court have stipulated that it may be dismissed and discontinued, and before the stipulation was signed two of the plaintiffs in error sold and assigned their interests in the land, which is the subject matter of the controversy in the suit, to Albert M. Henry, and a rule has been entered in vacation on the stipulation dismissing the case, held, that, upon the petition of the assignee of such interests, the entry of dismissal be amended by adding thereto the words "without prejudice to the right of Albert M. Henry to proceed as he may be advised in the court below for the protection of his interest."

IN ERROR to the Supreme Court of the State of Michigan. Petition by assignee of plaintiffs in error to set aside an order of discontinuance. Order amended.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. De Forest Paine, for plaintiffs in error and Samuel D. Cargill:

The plaintiffs in error having transferred all their interests in the land in controversy in this suit, the suit abates.

Wallace v. Dunning, Walker, Ch. 416; Webster v. Hitchcock, 11 Mich. 56; Widner v. Lane, 14 Mich. 124; Perkins v. Perkins, 16 Mich. 162; Brewer v. Dodge, 28 Mich. 359.

Mr. George William Moore, for petitioner.

Mr. Chief Justice Waite delivered the opinion of the court:

This writ of error was docketed here October 12, 1885. On the 8th of June, 1887, the parties of record entered into the following stipulation:

"It is hereby stipulated and agreed by and between the parties to this cause, by their respective attorneys, that the writ of error and appeal herein be dismissed and the said cause discontinued without costs to either party; that each party pay his own costs in this court and in the courts below; that the bond for damages executed by plaintiffs in error and sureties be canceled and the liability of the obligors discharged.

"An order shall be entered with the clerk accordingly."

Our Rule 28, is as follows:

"Whenever the plaintiff and defendant in a writ of error pending in this court, or the appellant or appellee in an appeal, shall in vacation, by their attorneys of record, sign and file with the clerk an agreement in writing directing the case to be dismissed, and specifying the terms on which it is to be dismissed as to costs, and shall pay to the clerk any fees that may be due to him, it shall be the duty of the clerk to enter the case dismissed, and to give to either party requesting it a copy of the agreement filed; but no mandate or other process shall issue without an order of the court."

Pursuant to this rule the stipulation of the parties was presented to the clerk of this court, on the 8th of June, 1887, in vacation, and he entered the case dismissed. No mandate or other process has as yet been ordered by the court.

Albert M. Henry claims to have purchased from Charles B. Colton and Lester A. Roberts, two of the plaintiffs in error, their respective interests in the land which is the subject matter of the controversy in the suit, on the 16th of May, 1887, before the stipulation was signed. He now comes here and by petition asks "that an order be entered in this court setting aside and vacating said order of discontinuance, so that your petitioner may have said cause revived as to himself as the grantee and assignee of said complainants, Colton and Roberts," on the ground that the stipulation was signed after his purchase and without authority from him.

Upon consideration of this petition it is ordered that the entry of dismissal made in vacation be amended by adding thereto these words: "Without prejudice to the right of Albert M. Henry to proceed as he may be advised in the court below for the protection of his interest."

This motion is denied. While the stipulation binds the parties to submit the cause without oral argument, there is nothing which requires this to be done at any particular time.
